Youth and Age.

I often think each tottering form
That limps along in life's decline,
Once bore a heart as young, as warm,
As full of idle thoughts as mine!
And each has had its dream of joy,
Its own unequalled pure romance;
Commencing when the blushing boy
First thrills at lovely woman's glance.

And each could tell his tale of youth,
Would think its scenes of love evince
More passions, more unearthly truth,
Than any tale before or since.
Yet they could tell of tender lays
At midnight pined in classic shades,
Of days more bright than modern days—
And made more fair than modern maid.

Of whispers in a willing ear,
Of kisses on a blushing cheek,
Each kiss, each whisper, far too dear
Our modern lips to speak.
Of passions too intimately crossed,
Of passions slighted or betrayed—
Of kindred spirits early lost,
And buds that blossom but to fade.

Of beaming eyes and tresses gay,
Elastic form and noble brow,
And forms that have all passed away,
And left them what we see them now.
And is it thus—is human love
So very light and frail a thing?
And must youth's brightest vision move
Forever on time's restless wing?

Must all the eyes that still are bright
And all the lips that talk of bliss,
And all the forms so fair to sight,
Hereafter only come to this?
Then what are earth's best visions worth,
If we at length must lose them thus?
If all we value most on earth
Ere long must fade away from us?

From the New York Times.

The Passage of the Persia—Incidents and Accidents.

We are indebted to Mr. Wm. E. Robinson, of this city, a passenger in the Persia, for the following interesting narrative of the voyage:

The Persia left Liverpool at about 1:20 p. m., on Saturday, September 3, with 232 passengers and a very full and valuable cargo. The weather at the start was fair, and none of those on board had any reason to anticipate the scenes of peril through which the gallant ship had afterwards to struggle.

Some of the passengers, myself among the number, had noticed, as we came aboard from the steamer, that which had brought us alongside, that the steamer was very heavily laden, drawing some twenty-four feet of water. This circumstance excited considerable comment among the passengers, many of whom expressed the conviction that the ship was too deep. Subsequent events, however, proved that this was probably our salvation, the heavy cargo serving to prevent the pitching of the Persia during the time she was compelled to lie to. On the way down the Mersey, we passed the Arabia, coming in, and saluted her. The weather continued fine during the whole of Saturday. The next day (Sunday) there was no material change.

The Persia, taking the southern channel, skirted the coast of Ireland, the hills of Wicklow and Kerry looking lovely in the distance. The day and night continued fair, the steamer making a moderate rate of speed, not equal to her usual run. Monday Sept. 5, opened fair, and so continued until about 5 p. m., when the sea roughened and brisk head-winds came, soon increasing to a gale. Still no alarm was felt until, at about 10 p. m., the Persia suddenly lurched, and rolled heavily to one side. By this time many of the passengers had retired, satisfied that the voyage although slow, was being successfully prosecuted.

The suddenness of the steamer's pitch, however, created an excitement. Some of the passengers were thrown out of their berths, one or two ladies suffered contusions, and there was considerable consternation on board. To calm the agitation, the officers of the ship announced that "a little pin in the machinery had got heated and had been broken, but that the damage would be repaired in a few minutes." It was soon ascertained, however, that the disaster was of a character too serious to admit of hasty repair. The broken pin was found to be the port crank-pin of the engine, the loss of which had entirely disabled the port paddle-wheel, and rendered the machinery nearly useless. Upon ascertaining the fact, the passengers experienced a variety of unpleasant sensations. The gale still blew dead ahead; the sea was very rough, many of the company on board were ill, and the machinery had not only become useless, but the head-winds prevented the use of the sails to steady the vessel.

In this emergency Captain Judkins exerted his masterly powers of seamanship in a manner which won him the regards of all on board. Finding that it was useless to attempt to make headway against the storm, with the disabled machinery, he immediately set to work to repair the damages.

This proved to be a formidable undertaking. The broken crank-pin, weighing fifteen or twenty hundred weight, and having a diameter of fourteen inches, had been fractured near the joint of junction with the crank; and although an extra pin, provided for such contingencies, remained available, it was a matter of no small difficulty to devise a method of extracting the fractured stump. Capt. Judkins saw that the only chance of saving the Persia lay in prompt action, and he is not the man to finish. After several attempts, the steamer was brought to obey her rudder, and her head being kept well to the wind, she forged along—making, however, but very little headway. Thus passed the night of Monday, the engineers keeping busily at work at the crank-pin, without success. On Tuesday morning, after consultation with the passengers, Capt. Judkins finally determined to put back into port. The verdict was unanimous, to the effect that any attempt to proceed further would not only be futile, but dangerous, in view of the continuance of the storm, the heavy cargo of the ship, and the disabled condition of the machinery.

At 4 p. m., on Tuesday, therefore, having been out three days, the Persia was put about, heading for Cork where it was intended to repair damages and replenish the supply of coal, and whence it was proposed to sail on the following Saturday. But the adventures during this remarkable voyage were not destined to end here.

On Wednesday, Sept. 7, at 9 a. m., while running for Cork at a speed of only six miles an hour, the Persia was spoken by the ship Ben Nevis, bound from Quebec to Liverpool, which, in her anxiety to approach within hailing distance, narrowly escaped a collision with the steamer. The Persia, hove to, and a boat from the Ben Nevis came aboard, although the sea was extremely rough, to beg that the steamer's physician might be sent to the relief of the Ben Nevis, who was believed to be in a dying condition.

Capt. Judkins, animated by the generous impulse of the seaman to a brother in distress, instantly acceded to the request, and sent with the doctor a liberal supply of comforts for the sick man. We afterwards learned that the attentions which were thus freely offered produced the happiest effect, and there is no reason to believe that the Captain of the Ben Nevis was enabled to land in safety at Liverpool. But, during the passage of maritime courtesy, a new idea seemed to have seized the mind of Capt. Judkins. Whether, like Gen. Taylor, he had an insurmountable repugnance to retracing his steps, or whether the feasibility of effecting his repairs on private account had suddenly occurred to him, I will not venture to decide. One fact is certain. The captain decided to remain. Improving the opportunity afforded by the temporary stop, the captain called all hands and made another effort to repair the engine. The adjustment of the crank proved to be a work of much difficulty. The waves dashing against the wheels, kept them in continual motion, and it became necessary to devise a plan for overcoming this trouble.

The method adopted was exceedingly simple. Holes of various sizes were cut in the sides of the paddle-boxes, through which a number of cables and chains were passed, and securely fastened to the wheels. The oscillations having been effectually overcome in this manner, attention was given to the broken crank-pin. The ingenuity of Mr. John Caldwell, the Chief Engineer, suggested a practicable method of driving out the pin. An iron bolt, working upon a wheel which was fixed to a support in the ceiling of the engine room was brought repeatedly, with great force, directly against the head of the broken pin. Some fifty men worked a line, which controlled the action of this improvised battering-ram. So sanguine of success in this attempt were the officers of the ship, that the work was continued throughout the night, but it proved unavailing. The pin still adhered to its socket, and the anxious passengers began to despair. Some retired to their state rooms; some walked the deck; others descended to the engine room to watch the progress of the work. The battering-ram was finally relinquished, and an effort was made in a new direction.

It was thought the expansion of the crank by the application of heat might overcome the difficulty, and this course was next tried. A bed of iron plates was placed immediately below the broken pin, and a brisk fire kindled upon it; the crank, being so adjusted as to bring the fire directly upon it. This roasting process was continued for a considerable time, and then Mr. Caldwell's battering-ram was again applied. A few sturdy strokes were given; the loosened pin yielded, little by little, and finally dropped. A cheer went up, to testify that one difficulty, at least, had been overcome. During all this weary period of suspense the storm continued to rage, the gale did not decrease, and the steamer rolled heavily.

The next process was the elevation of the crank to the proper position for receiving the new pin. Then another obstacle intervened. A transverse spar, intended to receive a smaller pin, to be keyed on, was found to be out of line; the crankpin was displaced, and a vigorous filing process was commenced, which continued for some hours. At last the pin was fitted, the transverse spar was put in place, the caps were adjusted, the connecting-rod adjusted, the paddle-wheels released from their lashings, the steam was gently let on, and the machinery again began to work, smoothly but slowly; and amid the loud cheers of all on board, the Persia's head was again turned towards New York, and Capt. Judkins and Engineer Caldwell were exalted to a fabulous height of esteem and confidence. That repairs of such a nature were so satisfactorily accomplished at sea, during a heavy storm, and on board a deeply-laden vessel, proves not only that the Persia is a staunch and seaworthy craft, but that those who have been invested with her charge are equal to any probable emergency. It is needless to say that every passenger on board the Persia united in the expressions of admiration which this extraordinary achievement has called forth.

The remainder of the voyage was accomplished without the occurrence of any other marked event. The rough weather continued for some days after the voyage had been resumed. The machinery was worked with extreme care, and, to guard against the occurrence of another accident, a stream of water was constantly kept running upon the crank-pin, to prevent it from becoming overheated. With this precaution, in spite of storm and fog, the Persia sighted Cape Race in safety, after a run of several days, during which she made a comparatively low rate of speed, feeling her way with extreme caution. Off Cape Race we saw a steamer lying to, but, in consequence of the violent storm, were unable to go to her assistance. This vessel was probably the Kangaroo, which subsequently put into Halifax for a supply of coal. The Persia encountered a succession of storms and head-winds during the entire voyage, and no more cheering sight could have been afforded her weary passengers than the faint glimmer of Montauk Light, which was sighted on Sunday evening. The clouds began to disappear; the night was fine, and as we passed Quarrantine, a brisk cannonade and a brilliant display of rockets announced the arrival of the Persia. Capt. Judkins blazed away with his guns with remarkable perseverance, to rouse the boarding-officer, in season to reach his wharf before a change of tide. The steamer came up under full steam, and entered her dock in splendid style, at about 2 1/2 o'clock on the morning of Monday. Were we not sorry that we had reached our home.

From the life travels and books of Alexander Von Humboldt, we extract the following interesting account:

On the 22d day of June, the birthday of his brother, Humboldt commenced his ascent of Chimborazo, accompanied by Bonpland and Carlos de Montufar, a young Spanish naturalist. They started from the plain of Tapia, at an elevation of over nine thousand feet. This arid table-land was near the village of Lican, the ancient residence of the sovereigns of Quito. From Lican to the summit of Chimborazo was nearly five leagues in a straight line. They followed the plain, leaving behind groups of Indians bound to the market of Lican, and slowly ascending, halted for the night at the little village of Calpi.

They were now at the foot of Chimborazo. It rose before them stupendously in the light of the setting sun. The foreground was veiled in the vaporous dimness that striped the lower strata of the air, but as they cast their eye towards the summit it detached itself from the deep blue sky. They saw above the region of luscious plants and alpine shrubs a broad belt of grass like a gilded yellow carpet. Beyond this was a region of porphyritic rocks, and beyond these rocks eternal ice and snow. As the earth below grew darker, the heaven above seemed to grow brighter; their sight was dazzled with the resplendent splendor of the snow.

Early the next morning their Indian guides awoke them, and they began to climb the mountain on the southwestern side, traversing the great plains which rose like terraces, one above another, until they reached the plain of Sisigun, twelve thousand four hundred feet above the level of the sea. Here Humboldt wished to ascertain the height of the summit, but it was shrouded in thick clouds. From time to time they caught a momentary glimpse of it through openings in the clouds, but the sky was gradually darkening. They continued to ascend until they reached the little lake of Yana Cocha, a circular basin of one hundred and thirty feet in diameter. It was the most elevated spot yet reached by man on the ridge of mountains, three thousand three hundred feet higher than the summit of Mont Blanc. Here they left their mules. The barometer showed a height of fourteen thousand four hundred and fifty feet. Crossing the yellow belt of grass which they had seen overnight, they came in a region of granite. Here rocks rose in columns fifty or sixty feet high, and looked like trunks of trees.

Travelling the aisles of this enchanted forest of stone over fields of new fallen snow, they gained a narrow ridge which led directly to the summit of Chimborazo, and by which alone they might hope to reach it; for the snow around was too soft and yielding to be ventured upon. The path became steeper and narrower, and at last the guides refused to go any further. When they were sixteen thousand five hundred feet high, all but one left them. Nothing daunted, however, the travelers went on, enveloped in a thick mist. The path which they were ascending was in places not more than eight or ten inches broad; the natives call it a "knife-blade." On one hand was a declivity of snow covered with a glassy coating of ice, on the other a chasm of 1,000 feet deep, the bottom of which was covered with masses of naked rocks. They inclined their bodies over the chasm, dangerous as it was, for they dared not trust themselves to the snowy path on the opposite side. Had they stumbled, they would either have been buried in the mingled snow and ice, or would have rolled headlong down the steep.

The character of the rock, which was brittle and crumbling, increased the difficulty of the ascent. Here and there they were obliged to crawl on their hands and feet; the sharp edges of the rock wounded them, and left behind them a bloody trail. They marched in single file, testing with their poles the stability of the rocks before them. This precaution was very necessary, as many of the rocks were lying loose on the brink of the precipice. Desirous of knowing how much of the mountain remained to be ascended, for the summit was continued hidden from their sight, Humboldt opened the barometer on a point where the path was broad enough to allow two persons to sit side by side; the mercury indicated a height of eighteen thousand three hundred and eighty feet. The temperature of the air was 38 degrees, and that of the earth 107 degrees.

They proceeded for another hour, and found the rocky path less steep; the mist, however, was thicker than ever. They now began to suffer severely from the extreme rarification of the air. They breathed with difficulty, and what was still more disagreeable, felt like vomiting. Their heads swam, their lips and gums bled profusely, and their eyelids and eyeballs were charged with blood. From time to time, great birds, probably condors, came swooping down the terrible pass, sailing grandly away; and little winged insects, resembling flies, fluttered gaily around. It was impossible to catch them, owing to the narrowness of the ledge; but Humboldt judged that they were Diptera. Bonpland saw yellow butterflies, a little lower down, flying very near the ground.

Finally the belts of cloud parted, and they saw on the sudden the vast dome of Chimborazo. It seemed near them, so near that in a few minutes they might reach it. The ledges, too, seemed to favor them by becoming broader. They hurried onward for a short distance, excited with hope of soon standing on the pinnacle. All at once the path was stopped by a chasm four hundred feet deep and eighty feet broad. There was no way by which they could cross it; the difficulty was insurmountable. To tantalize them still further, they saw that the path went forward on the other side of the ledge, evidently reaching the summit. If they could have but crossed that chasm!

It was one o'clock in the afternoon, and they were benumbed with cold. They were 19,200 feet above the level of the sea. The belt of clouds closed again, and the peak was lost. The mist grew thicker and thicker, and everything indicated a storm. There was nothing left them but to descend. Halting long enough to collect a few specimens of the rock, they retraced their steps. A storm of hail overtook them, but as they descended into a lower atmosphere it changed into snow. When they had reached the little lake of Yana Cocha, where they left their mules, they found the ground covered with snow several inches deep. Before dusk they reached the Indian village of Calpi, and were entertained that night by the priest.

So ended the attempt to scale the summit of Chimborazo. The fate of Sir John Franklin, so long shrouded in mystery, is at last clearly revealed. The grim region of frost and snow which so long and jealously guarded the painful secret has been forced to yield it up to the world; and even the fond and faithful woman who, in the face of convincing proofs to the contrary, clung with a heroic faith to the belief of her husband's continued existence, and kept warm in her heart the hope of his return—even she must now open her eyes to the dreadful truth, that while she watched and waited, the lost wanderer had made his voyage to the spirit land. Lady Franklin's Arctic expedition, sent out to discover, if possible, some traces of the lost explorer, has returned to England bringing journals and records of the sufferings and death of Franklin, and, also the bones of some of those who perished with him. Sir John, himself, died, it appears, on King William's Island, on the 11th of June, 1847. He sailed from England with the Erebus and Terror, on the 19th of May, 1845, and on the 6th of July following, his expedition was seen for the last time, by a whale ship in Baffin's Bay, moored to an iceberg, waiting for the opening of Lancaster sound. In 1848 an expedition was fitted out and sent to search for him. Two others, one under command of Sir James Ross, followed in the course of the same year, but all were unsuccessful. In 1850 several other expeditions were fitted out—the most important of which was the one prepared chiefly at the expense of Henry Grinnell, of New York, and consisting of the vessels Advance and Rescue, commanded by Lieut. De Haven. It sailed from New York on the 24th of May, 1850. On the 3d of June, 1851, the Prince Albert started out under the auspices of Lady Franklin, and in April, 1852, a fleet of five vessels commanded by Sir Edward Belcher, followed. In May, 1853, Dr. Kane's famous expedition sailed, and in 1855 followed the one fitted out by the U. S. Government, under the command of Lieut. Hartstein, to relieve Dr. Kane's. After all these had returned, Lady Franklin prepared another. It has just returned with mournful story of her husband's hardships and death.

Here and there they were obliged to crawl on their hands and feet; the sharp edges of the rock wounded them, and left behind them a bloody trail. They marched in single file, testing with their poles the stability of the rocks before them. This precaution was very necessary, as many of the rocks were lying loose on the brink of the precipice. Desirous of knowing how much of the mountain remained to be ascended, for the summit was continued hidden from their sight, Humboldt opened the barometer on a point where the path was broad enough to allow two persons to sit side by side; the mercury indicated a height of eighteen thousand three hundred and eighty feet. The temperature of the air was 38 degrees, and that of the earth 107 degrees.

They proceeded for another hour, and found the rocky path less steep; the mist, however, was thicker than ever. They now began to suffer severely from the extreme rarification of the air. They breathed with difficulty, and what was still more disagreeable, felt like vomiting. Their heads swam, their lips and gums bled profusely, and their eyelids and eyeballs were charged with blood. From time to time, great birds, probably condors, came swooping down the terrible pass, sailing grandly away; and little winged insects, resembling flies, fluttered gaily around. It was impossible to catch them, owing to the narrowness of the ledge; but Humboldt judged that they were Diptera. Bonpland saw yellow butterflies, a little lower down, flying very near the ground.

Finally the belts of cloud parted, and they saw on the sudden the vast dome of Chimborazo. It seemed near them, so near that in a few minutes they might reach it. The ledges, too, seemed to favor them by becoming broader. They hurried onward for a short distance, excited with hope of soon standing on the pinnacle. All at once the path was stopped by a chasm four hundred feet deep and eighty feet broad. There was no way by which they could cross it; the difficulty was insurmountable. To tantalize them still further, they saw that the path went forward on the other side of the ledge, evidently reaching the summit. If they could have but crossed that chasm!

It was one o'clock in the afternoon, and they were benumbed with cold. They were 19,200 feet above the level of the sea. The belt of clouds closed again, and the peak was lost. The mist grew thicker and thicker, and everything indicated a storm. There was nothing left them but to descend. Halting long enough to collect a few specimens of the rock, they retraced their steps. A storm of hail overtook them, but as they descended into a lower atmosphere it changed into snow. When they had reached the little lake of Yana Cocha, where they left their mules, they found the ground covered with snow several inches deep. Before dusk they reached the Indian village of Calpi, and were entertained that night by the priest.

So ended the attempt to scale the summit of Chimborazo. The fate of Sir John Franklin, so long shrouded in mystery, is at last clearly revealed. The grim region of frost and snow which so long and jealously guarded the painful secret has been forced to yield it up to the world; and even the fond and faithful woman who, in the face of convincing proofs to the contrary, clung with a heroic faith to the belief of her husband's continued existence, and kept warm in her heart the hope of his return—even she must now open her eyes to the dreadful truth, that while she watched and waited, the lost wanderer had made his voyage to the spirit land. Lady Franklin's Arctic expedition, sent out to discover, if possible, some traces of the lost explorer, has returned to England bringing journals and records of the sufferings and death of Franklin, and, also the bones of some of those who perished with him. Sir John, himself, died, it appears, on King William's Island, on the 11th of June, 1847. He sailed from England with the Erebus and Terror, on the 19th of May, 1845, and on the 6th of July following, his expedition was seen for the last time, by a whale ship in Baffin's Bay, moored to an iceberg, waiting for the opening of Lancaster sound. In 1848 an expedition was fitted out and sent to search for him. Two others, one under command of Sir James Ross, followed in the course of the same year, but all were unsuccessful. In 1850 several other expeditions were fitted out—the most important of which was the one prepared chiefly at the expense of Henry Grinnell, of New York, and consisting of the vessels Advance and Rescue, commanded by Lieut. De Haven. It sailed from New York on the 24th of May, 1850. On the 3d of June, 1851, the Prince Albert started out under the auspices of Lady Franklin, and in April, 1852, a fleet of five vessels commanded by Sir Edward Belcher, followed. In May, 1853, Dr. Kane's famous expedition sailed, and in 1855 followed the one fitted out by the U. S. Government, under the command of Lieut. Hartstein, to relieve Dr. Kane's. After all these had returned, Lady Franklin prepared another. It has just returned with mournful story of her husband's hardships and death.

On the 22d day of June, the birthday of his brother, Humboldt commenced his ascent of Chimborazo, accompanied by Bonpland and Carlos de Montufar, a young Spanish naturalist. They started from the plain of Tapia, at an elevation of over nine thousand feet. This arid table-land was near the village of Lican, the ancient residence of the sovereigns of Quito. From Lican to the summit of Chimborazo was nearly five leagues in a straight line. They followed the plain, leaving behind groups of Indians bound to the market of Lican, and slowly ascending, halted for the night at the little village of Calpi.

They were now at the foot of Chimborazo. It rose before them stupendously in the light of the setting sun. The foreground was veiled in the vaporous dimness that striped the lower strata of the air, but as they cast their eye towards the summit it detached itself from the deep blue sky. They saw above the region of luscious plants and alpine shrubs a broad belt of grass like a gilded yellow carpet. Beyond this was a region of porphyritic rocks, and beyond these rocks eternal ice and snow. As the earth below grew darker, the heaven above seemed to grow brighter; their sight was dazzled with the resplendent splendor of the snow.

Early the next morning their Indian guides awoke them, and they began to climb the mountain on the southwestern side, traversing the great plains which rose like terraces, one above another, until they reached the plain of Sisigun, twelve thousand four hundred feet above the level of the sea. Here Humboldt wished to ascertain the height of the summit, but it was shrouded in thick clouds. From time to time they caught a momentary glimpse of it through openings in the clouds, but the sky was gradually darkening. They continued to ascend until they reached the little lake of Yana Cocha, a circular basin of one hundred and thirty feet in diameter. It was the most elevated spot yet reached by man on the ridge of mountains, three thousand three hundred feet higher than the summit of Mont Blanc. Here they left their mules. The barometer showed a height of fourteen thousand four hundred and fifty feet. Crossing the yellow belt of grass which they had seen overnight, they came in a region of granite. Here rocks rose in columns fifty or sixty feet high, and looked like trunks of trees.

Travelling the aisles of this enchanted forest of stone over fields of new fallen snow, they gained a narrow ridge which led directly to the summit of Chimborazo, and by which alone they might hope to reach it; for the snow around was too soft and yielding to be ventured upon. The path became steeper and narrower, and at last the guides refused to go any further. When they were sixteen thousand five hundred feet high, all but one left them. Nothing daunted, however, the travelers went on, enveloped in a thick mist. The path which they were ascending was in places not more than eight or ten inches broad; the natives call it a "knife-blade." On one hand was a declivity of snow covered with a glassy coating of ice, on the other a chasm of 1,000 feet deep, the bottom of which was covered with masses of naked rocks. They inclined their bodies over the chasm, dangerous as it was, for they dared not trust themselves to the snowy path on the opposite side. Had they stumbled, they would either have been buried in the mingled snow and ice, or would have rolled headlong down the steep.

The character of the rock, which was brittle and crumbling, increased the difficulty of the ascent. Here and there they were obliged to crawl on their hands and feet; the sharp edges of the rock wounded them, and left behind them a bloody trail. They marched in single file, testing with their poles the stability of the rocks before them. This precaution was very necessary, as many of the rocks were lying loose on the brink of the precipice. Desirous of knowing how much of the mountain remained to be ascended, for the summit was continued hidden from their sight, Humboldt opened the barometer on a point where the path was broad enough to allow two persons to sit side by side; the mercury indicated a height of eighteen thousand three hundred and eighty feet. A Great Rascal Swindles a Governor.

The trial of Lieutenant Colonel Marmaduke Reeves (that is what he calls himself) for grand larceny, in swindling Miss Cora L. Woodbine of a sum of money, a gold ring, and other jewelry, on the 6th of September last, was called on in the general sessions of today. The fellow's real name is John McAlpine. This is the second trial—he having been convicted of embezzlement and sentenced to the state prison for two years, in 1852. The circumstances of the case will be remembered.

Miss Woodbine is a governess out of employment. On the 20th of August last she inserted an advertisement for a situation. McAlpine answered it, and an interview between the parties was had, the latter assuming the name of Walter Black. To make a long story short, the scamp engaged the young lady's services and "arranged" to leave for the South on the following morning. That night he took her to the Clinton Place Hotel and persuaded her to register her name as his wife. What follows is in the words of the District Attorney.

The following morning, at five o'clock, Mack came; he appeared to be somewhat intoxicated; he said that he was tired and must rest; this was in her room; she got out of bed and dressed herself in the outer room; he went into her bed; in the morning he told her to order breakfast, which she did; at breakfast he tore a line carbuncle ring from her finger before she knew what he was doing; he admired the ring, put it on his finger and went out.

Subsequently she asked him to pay for the breakfast. He preferred that she should pay for it. She had to give him a pocket book, and instead of handing it back he put it into his pocket. When he stated that he had an appointment, and must leave immediately. He refused that his watch had stopped, and he would take it to Tiffany's to have it repaired, and asked, as he was very much amused, of knowing the time, if she would not lend him her watch. She lent him her watch; he said he would come again in the evening; she did not see him again till Monday, the 5th, at 11 o'clock. At 11 o'clock, a few days afterwards, he remained only a few minutes, and he asked her if she had any more money; she said that she had none; he asked her if she could not borrow some, and said that in a few days he would be provided with plenty of money; he said himself borrow a couple of hundred dollars, but said that he was too proud to borrow so small a sum; in the evening he told her to have her trunks ready; as they would have to leave immediately.

He went down stairs and told her to follow. At the door he told her to look for a carman, while he was paying the bill. The carman was directed to take the trunks to the Jersey City Ferry. She was put into a stage and went to the ferry to wait him there as he had directed. She waited until 10 1/2 p. m., but "Marmaduke" did not come. The swindle was now apparent. The lady told her story to the police, and the arrest of the scamp soon after followed. The probabilities are that he will be convicted. — N. Y. Com. Phil. Ledger.

WOMAN A MIRACLE.—Place her among flowers, foster her as a tender plant, and she is a thing of fancy, waywardness, and sometimes folly—annoyed by a dew drop, fretted by the touch of a butterfly's wing, and ready to faint at the rustle of a beetle; the physicists are too roughly, the showery too heavy, and she is overpowered by the perfume of a rose bud. But let real calamity come—rouse her affection—enkindle the fires of her heart, and mark her then; how her heart strengthens itself—how strong is her purpose. Place her in the heat of battle—give her a child, a bird—anything she loves or pities, to protect—and see her, as in a relative instance, raising her white arms as a shield, as her own blood crimson her upturned forehead, praying for life to protect the helpless. Transplant her in the dark places of the earth—awaken her energies to action, and her breath becomes a healing—her presence blessing. She disputes, inch by inch, stride of the stalking pestilence, a man, the strong and brave, shrinks pale and affrighted. Misfortune dawns her not; she wears away a life of silent endurance, and goes forward with less timidity than to her bridal. In prosperity she is a bud full of odors, waiting but for the winds of adversity to scatter them a-broad—pure gold, valuable, but united in the furnace. In short—woman is a miracle—a mystery, the center from which radiates the great charm of existence.

CHEER LIVING IN PARIS.—A correspondent of the New York Herald writes from Paris as follows: Here is the result of one day's expenses: Room 20 sous, breakfast 5, lunch 10, 16—making a total of 40 sous, or a little less in federal currency than that number of cents. But many persons live here at a much less rate than that. I do not, of course, refer to the laboring people—men and women who live on half of it—but to clerks, students, artists, men about town and the like. It is not considered disgraceful to be economical, and I have often seen very gentlemanly men coming out of a baker's shop in the morning with a small roll in their hands which cost one sou, and which they ate as they passed along the street. A very distinguished professor in the college of Sorbonne was pointed out to me a few days since, engaged in this economical, gentlemanly frugation and mastication.

A young man having advertised for a wife, received word from 18 married men that he might have theirs.

Our Paper.

With the commencement of a new volume, we not only offer a reduction in the subscription terms of the "Valley Tan," but also present the paper a good deal enlarged and improved in appearance. We are no great believers in the principle of the old Whigs, "that a high tariff makes cheap goods." Nor can we say that the reduction in the terms of our paper, enables us to publish a paper at a cheaper rate than heretofore. Nevertheless, we hope with the addition to our subscription list which advancement on our part merits, to furnish to our readers, at least a greater amount of reading matter at a less cost than heretofore.

THE NEWS.

It is rather late now to rehearse the news brought by the eastern mail, which arrived a week ago, but as no later dates have been since received, and as we had no opportunity of examining our exchanges previously to the publication of our last paper, we venture, at the risk of being considered foggy or antiquated, to recapitulate very briefly a few of the principal items of interest. And the principle one, probably, since our former ad former advices, is the result of the elections that have been held in several of the States of the North, and also in one or two of the South.

Elections for state officers and members of the state legislatures, mainly, have been held in the States of Pennsylvania, Indiana, Ohio, Iowa and Minnesota, which resulted very generally in the success of the Republican and opposition party, with, however, widely different success, as well as very different issues, in the several States named.

The Republican majority of Ohio is something near 20,000, while that of Minnesota is very small, if they have succeeded at all in that State. This at least proves that there still exists in the States of the North a powerful and conservative minority battling against fanaticism. Elections have also been held in the Southern States of Georgia, Florida, and Mississippi, which have resulted as usual in the complete triumph of the Democratic party. The elections in these States are chiefly important and interesting, as indicating, in some degree, the probable result of the next presidential contest in the several States named.

By the return of the steam yacht "Fox," which was sent out by Lady Franklin, as a last effort to discover the fate of her husband, and those of the voyagers accompanying him on his expedition undertaken eleven years ago, for the purpose of ascertaining the truth in regard to a north west passage, the mystery which has so long hung over the fate of Franklin and the vessels in which he sailed has been solved. Sir John Franklin died on the 11th of June 1847, and the crews of the Erebus and Terror amounting to 105 men, abandoned those vessels on the 22nd of April 1848, and undertook to make their way to the Great Fish River in the north part of British America; in this perilous undertaking they all perished. Capt. McClintock the commander of the "Fox" brought back with him several relics of the lost voyagers.

The California mail arrived on Thursday last bringing dates from the Pacific as late as the 22nd ultimo. The news is unimportant. Gen. Scott arrived in San Francisco, on the 16th of October in the steamer "Uncle Sam" and was honored with a public reception, he proceeded the next day in the steamer Northern to Oregon en route to the scenes of our late difficulty with Great Britain, where it is hoped that his experience, moderation and wisdom in conducting controversies similar to that which has grown up concerning this single island, will quickly lead to a renewal of amicable feeling in regard to its possession or occupation of it, and pave the way for the final settlement of the disputed boundary between the two nations on terms equally just and honorable to both.

Jones, Russell & Co's express from Leavenworth City arrived early this morning. It brought no news. Briefly, the agent informed us that a man by the name of Williams, a former agent of Jones, Russell & Co. at Denver City, had been elected a lobby delegate to Congress to advocate the erection of Pike's Peak and the gold region into a new territory.

The divorce docket of the Supreme Court now in session at Providence, R. I., contains eighty-three petitions for release from matrimony. The Court appears determined to keep up with the business, and in a single hour removed the yoke from the necks of twelve discontented couples.

Shorter Route from Utah to California.

The following letter from Capt. J. H. Simpson, we copy from the National Intelligencer of October the 8th. From the Itinerary of Capt. Simpson, published in the Valley Tan some months since, the public have already been made somewhat familiar with the new route opened to California, by that energetic and accomplished officer. But the present letter will be read with interest apart from any additional information in regard to the route explored by Captain Simpson:

CAMP ON THE SWEET WATER, 320 miles from Camp Floyd, en route for Fort Leavenworth, Sept. 6, 1859.

MY DEAR BROTHER: When I last wrote to you, May 17th, I was with my party in Ruby Valley, two hundred and thirty-four miles from Camp Floyd, exploring the country for a new wagon route to Carson Valley, there to connect with a well-known route over the Sierra Nevada to California. We reached Genoa, in Carson Valley, at the east foot of the Sierra Nevada, June 12th, having conducted our wagons, fourteen in number, across valleys and through mountain passes with much less difficulty than we had anticipated; and obtaining a good road. By this new route the travelling distance between Camp Floyd and California has been shortened about two hundred and fifty miles, and a much better road, in respect to the great essentials water, wood, and grass, than the old St. Mary's or Humboldt river route, with which the comparison is made, evolved. If the comparison be made with the present post route, which is an extension as far as Ruby Valley of my route of last fall, the difference in favor of my later route is about one hundred and forty-four miles.

The people of Genoa were highly pleased with the result of the expedition, and honored our entry into their little town by the firing of cannon and in giving us a social entertainment. The good people of the interior of California, particularly in Placerville and Sacramento, were also highly delighted, and could not express too strongly their sense of the value which the new route is destined to be to them.

While my party lay recruiting at Genoa I made a flying visit to San Francisco, Major Frederic Dodge, the Indian agent in that region, and lately, I believe, elected delegate to advocate before Congress the erection of that portion of Utah into a Territory, accompanying me. We left Genoa June 12th, and arrived at San Francisco June 15th. From Genoa, over the Sierra Nevada, to Placerville, eighty miles, we rode on mules; thence to Folsom, twenty-seven miles, we traveled in stylish stages, drawn by handsome fleet horses; thence to Sacramento, twenty-three miles, by steam car; and thence to San Francisco, one hundred and twenty miles, by steamboat. The stages, railroad cars, and steamboat were equal to any I have seen in the Atlantic States; and what shall I say of the country I passed through? Words fail to express my admiration of its fertility, beauty, and value. Persons like myself, who have traveled much on the arid plains intervening the States bordering the Missouri and California, are apt to be impressed, from the constantly recurring scene of sandy desert wastes, as you proceed westward, that this character of country obtains all the way to the Pacific. But this, much to my gratification, I found not to be the case. Præsto, as soon as you place your foot on the Sierra Nevada a new order of nature appears. The eternal sage bush, (artemisia,) of which you have not for a day been out of sight since you left the Rocky Mountains, and the scrub cedar, which is the principle tree, disappear entirely, and in their stead lofty pines and fir become the characteristics. These attain an enormous size, the former being frequently seen as much as eight feet in diameter. The streams are more numerous, and appear as pure gushing rapids or cataracts, leaping over precipices, or beautiful limpid streams; gladdening the valleys and expanding themselves in beautiful lakes. And then as you descend the Sierra on the west side, the large umbrageous oak gradually takes the place of the pine, and becomes the gem of the landscape. These, existing in clusters or solitary, and disposed in the beautifully irregular and inimitable manner in which nature throws her ornaments, and among wheat fields of the greatest amplitude and of the most rich, luxuriant, and fruitful growth, surrounded too by broad fences of a plain but neat character, form a combination of the most pleasing character. And, then, the gradually level character which the country assumes as you approach the Sacramento Valley; the neat farm-houses, which appear almost as frequently as in our older and most populous States; the ugly feature, so common in the older States, of old stumps of trees marring the scene, no where being visible; all these characteristics have so indelibly and impressively charmed me that I shall ever regard the transition from the east to the west side of the Sierra Nevada as the most marked in my life.

But I am dwelling too long on this theme. California, I can only say, is, I believe, destined to be a great, if not the greatest, State in the Union. Her towns and cities vie with any east of the Rocky Mountains, and her population, like her soil, teems with a vigor which can only be comprehended by those who have been in her midst. The people of the East can have no conception of the progress this young sister of the Confederacy has made in all the elements which go to make up a happy, powerful, and efficient State. The secret is in her climate, her soil, her productions, vegetable, cereal, mineral; her splendid rivers, her lovely scenery, her magnificent harbor of San Francisco, her relationship to the commerce of the Indies and China, and the so-called Eastern World generally; all these have made her what she is, and as she grows in age so will all these advantages continue to cause her to grow in wealth and power. We spent two days in San Francisco and one (the Sabbath) in Sacramento most agreeably. In the latter place I saw a number of Jersey men, among them a couple of Brunswickers, (old friends, on schoolmate), both of them in positions of honor and usefulness. Major Dodge and myself attended the services and heard preaching in the Episcopal Church, and were delighted with the taste displayed in the material of the building as well as the good order, propriety, and efficiency of the services. The singing was excellent. On the 23d of June we reached Genoa, on our return, and the next day I started back with my party for Camp Floyd. On this my return trip I only occasionally at the outset touched my outward route, much the greater portion of it being again entirely new, and from twenty-five to forty miles south of the other. I am happy to inform you that, though in our outward route we were quite successful, as I have already stated, in our inward we were still more so. In distance there was no advantage gained; but in respect to wood, water, grass and grade the road is far preferable. This is the route I have recommended emigrants to take, and already a number of trains, as also a large herd of cattle, have taken it. I have had itineraries of it prepared and published in the Salt Lake City and California papers. Heretofore about twenty-five per cent. of the stock driven over the old Humboldt route have died from insufficiency and poisonous grass and water. On the new route there need be no deaths from this cause. The saving to the country from this source alone will be immense.

I could say much of the ignorance which has prevailed in relation to the country we have traversed; of the idea which has obtained that it was an unmitigated desert, over which man or beast could not venture without the prospect of certain death. But I am already swelling this letter, I fear, to a tedious length; suffice it, therefore, to say that on our most southern route, where it was supposed the desert would be encountered in its greatest poverty, we found the best soil, most luxuriant grass, (in places fine clover,) the most abundant timber, and the purest and most reliable water.

The plan I pursued was to send my guide party with ten days' provisions ahead, and whilst confining them, independent of existing trails, to the examination of passes, water courses, springs, and grass within certain limits, agreeably to a predetermined direction, based upon known data of longitude and latitude, every twenty-four hours in the day or night one of the party was sent back to inform me of the country ahead, so that with scarcely an exception we traveled every day with the precision of certainty, and with the constant assurance we were evolving the best route the country afforded. Twice we had come to nearly a dead halt on account of reports from the guide party of impracticable passes ahead, and once I had to run back twenty miles to keep the stock from perishing for want of water and grass; but further examinations which I directed caused the difficulties to disappear, and literally, as one of the party remarked, the passes seemed to open out to us as we advanced. On one occasion the animals were without water for sixty hours, and when they did drink could not be generally satisfied with less than eight buckets full. I am assured that one of them in the course of a few hours drank fourteen buckets full. Of course we were prudent enough not to let them drink this much at once, but before they were satisfied they drank as much as I have stated. This occurred on our return, when we were exploring the Great Salt Lake desert. Indeed on this occasion to get them to water at all they had to be driven after dark, in a severe thunder storm, some twelve miles. In the pitchy darkness and amongst thick cedars the herd separated into two, the more strong pushing ahead and the weaker lagging behind; and while one portion went twelve miles another went eighteen. They however were got together the second day after. At this time I began to fear that the expedition, at least on its return trip, was about to fail; but thanks to a kind Providence, while all those difficulties were being endured, the water and grass were eventually discovered, and so related in locality as subsequently to be connected by a direct line of road; and thus another great objection to the Utah route to California, the Great Salt Lake desert, very greatly mitigated, if not entirely obviated.

In this connexion I must not omit to mention the good Samaritan, in the shape of an Indian some fifty-five years of age, who, though a cripple, occasioned by a fall from a horse some years ago, and only capable of self-locomotion by the support of his hands in a sitting posture, yet, in the goodness of his heart, while we were in this sad extremity about water, manifested the greatest compassion for us, and actually, with his hearty consent, suffered himself to be taken up bodily and put on a mule and rode as a guide to the water twelve miles off in the night referred to. The next day he returned to our camp, full of exclamations of delight at again seeing us, but so exhausted that when he was taken off his mule and carried to the fire his only cry was, "water, water," which was immediately furnished him. A good supper was gotten for him which he partook of heartily; but some "Schiedam Schnapps," which was offered to him as a restorative, he persistently refused to drink, saying in his way, "it was no good;" but showing by rubbing his thigh and pointing to the spirits that he wanted it applied in that way; which of course was done. In addition to all this which he did for us, he had permitted his son, apparently his only support, to go with my guide party several days in advance to show the water, grass, and mountain passes. Of course, all this disinterestedness, coupled as it was with his crippled condition, made us all very grateful to him, and we felt that we could not give enough in return. Among other things, one of my party prepared a pair of crutches for him to walk with; but alas! when I had him lifted up and the crutches applied under his shoulders, we perceived that he was paralyzed in both legs, and could not put either foot to the ground. He was so treated like a king that he could not understand it; and would every once in a while look at us and laugh outright with astonishment and joy. The spring where his wick-ke-up (habitation) is I have called, therefore, "the good Indi-

Floyd for the travelers generally. But the animals were not the only sufferers on the trip. Our chief guide was for two days without any thing to eat, and when he did come in was so much exhausted from fatigue, his mule having given out, that he supported himself with a couple of canes or sticks, and when we came up to him sank helplessly into a sage bush. He was offered some fine fat rats by some Digger Indians he met; but having been roasted with entrails and all in them, he said he was not quite hungry enough to accept of their hospitality. The Indian Uto, "Pete," one of Dr. Hurl's faithful Indians, who stuck to him to the last on his flight from Mormon desperadoes, and who, thanks to the doctor, was my interpreter (and a most faithful and intelligent adjunct he proved to be to the expedition) in a laudable attempt to find an Indian who had been of great service to us in our outward trip; went to the mail station in Battle Valley, on the post route where he lived; but finding the spring there dried up and the station abandoned he was of necessity four days and three nights without food. A dragoon, on account of his horse giving out, was two days and nights without food. But now that our explorations have been successful, all these hardships and hardships are only referred to as reminiscences of an usual kind, on that account none the less interesting.

I arrived at Camp Floyd on my return from Genoa on the 3d of this month; my party on the 5th. On the 9th I left for Fort Leavenworth, my instructions from Gen. Johnston having been to explore on my way a new pass from the valley of the Timpanogos to the Vinta river valley, for the purpose of getting a new and more direct wagon route to the States from Camp Floyd than any we now have. I found the pass favorable, and if, during the next season, a pass can be found through the east range of the rocky mountains correspondingly favorable, the end in view will be gained. Even as it is, it is certain that the route to the States by the Cochatope pass can now be shortened probably about eighty miles. I also on my way to Fort Bridger examined the country to the south of the Timpanogos and White Clay creek route of last fall from Camp Floyd to see if I could not improve it; but although I found favorable mountain passes which would shorten the road from seven to twelve miles, yet the advantages and disadvantages are such as probably not to make it expedient to modify the route.

We are now hastening to Fort Leavenworth, thence to Washington, whence I shall be glad once more to visit my relatives and friends in the vicinity.

Very affectionately, your brother
J. H. SIMPSON.

The Arctic Revelations.

The veil which so long hung over the fate of Sir John Franklin and his unfortunate comrades has at last been rent asunder. Nine years at least have already elapsed since all hope of their return was lost, but the despair of seeing them did not lessen the interest felt by everybody in their fate, the desire to know where, how and when they met their end, and on what spot of the awful wastes which they undertook to explore. There was something terribly tantalizing in the disappearance of two ships-of-war, manned by full crews, and provided with everything which could give them a chance of safety within the frozen wilderness, whose secret two centuries of courageous endeavor on the part of the greatest maritime nations of the world, and of unboarded of fortitude on the part of the explorers they employed, have not sufficed to reveal. There is hardly a man of this generation whom the noble story of Arctic explorations has not moved to the depths of his soul, and Franklin was one of the ablest, oldest and bravest men who had trodden that perilous path. For nearly ten years he himself has occupied in all our eyes the place of interest which he had previously assigned to natural mysteries which he sailed to unfold. He has himself, during that period, been sought with more courage and more devotion, with deeper fortitude or holier enthusiasm, than those he or his predecessors ever displayed, great as their heroism undoubtedly was, in the search for the Northwest passage. It is but two years since the United States sent on this track a man of whom the age may well be proud, and of whom his country may well boast as long as religious heroism is a thing to boast of. Only two winters ago, around every fire-side in England as well as here, there were eyes wet with tears over Kane's noble record of the long Arctic night through which he watched in the brave hope that he might tell the world where Franklin and his men had perished, and we had hardly done perusing it when Kane himself died in the cause. The world had well nigh despaired of ever getting another ray of light thrown on the mystery. The ships had sailed away into the frozen seas. Eight years of pursuit had brought no better traces of the expedition than a few graves, a few instruments, a few vague Esquimaux rumors; and the public had almost been reconciled to the pain of uncertainty as to the exact nature of its fate, by the perfect certainty which time had brought that no member of it was now living. Happily, Lady Franklin hoped against hope, was proof against demonstration and against failure; and when both England and America had recoiled from the icy barrier in despair, she launched one more ship on the track. It was a small screw steamer, commanded by Capt. McClintock, manned by 25 men, and, as the result proves, all worthy of one another and of the duty they undertook. This last reserve of a wife's devotion has done what all else failed to accomplish. The fate of Franklin and his ships and men is at last known. He died twelve years ago. A year after the two ships were abandoned, and the surviving crews—105 men in all—started on their march southward over the ice. They perished miserably, man by man, along the frozen waste, and

There was but one thing wanting to have made this Franklin expedition worthy of as noble an epic as that which has immortalized the fall of Troy and the conquest of Jerusalem—and that was that the man who laid bare the mystery which has perplexed us for twelve years should be worthy of the men in whose footsteps he followed; and we are glad to say, this, too, has been vouchsafed us. The story of Capt. McClintock's wanderings, as told in his own narrative, forms a worthy close to this great tragedy. There are incidents calmly recorded in it which no tale of adventure has supplied anything to surpass, and which we hope will be mentioned with honor as long as courageous devotion to duty, in the face of the most appalling perils, finds anybody to admire it. Our age is, after all, the age of chivalry. The march of Christian civilization may have turned the fire which precipitates a murderous shock, but it has fed the calmer and nobler heroism which, for duty's sake, supports the hardest strain, and fercest struggle, and sorest trial, not for an hour, or for a day, but for weeks, and months, and years.

As to the English version of the Bible, we venerate it as much as we do any uninspired monument of human wisdom and labor. It stands in our literature as do many of the venerable cathedrals of England in architecture, which have through successive periods gathered upon themselves every religious style known to the island, so that they are not merely monumental churches, but histories as well, and memorials of sacred architecture. And yet, in all their beauty and grandeur, they are not put beyond criticism, nor invested in any such superstitious sanctity as shall make the expression of an honest opinion a sin.

And so it is with the English version of God's Word. We revere it as the most precious gift of God to our literature. And yet, as a translation, noble as a whole, it has in detail its many faults, which the whole world do know. And to speak of them is not to get oneself up either as an instructor of David, or a censor of the translators, but simply to exercise the rights which belong to every honest man whose business calls him to express an opinion upon such things.

THE PRESENT POPULATION OF PHILADELPHIA.—If we needed any other evidence of the great growth of Philadelphia, than the extent of ground which has been covered with houses since the last census, we shall find it in the fact just revealed by the labor of Mr. Cohen, in marking up the City Directory of Philadelphia. He has gone sufficiently far into that work to show that the population of Philadelphia at the present time is 680,000 persons—an increase of 271,238 persons since the last census, taken nine years ago, or about 66 1-9 per cent. The increase for the previous ten years was 58 3-4 per cent. The increase of population, therefore, has been eight per cent. greater in the last nine years than it was in the previous ten.

Philadelphia, with the exception of London and Paris, has a population larger, perhaps, than any other European city. It has 135,000 more inhabitants than New York had at the last census—545,000; though that city, like Philadelphia, has largely increased its population since that time, and probably numbers 750,000 at this time. The large increase in the population of Philadelphia is doubtless owing to the spread of its manufacturing. No city in the Union is more largely and variously engaged in this branch of productive industry. This, with the vast mineral resources of the State, developed by Philadelphia capital, is the great source of its prosperity and its wealth, and in making Philadelphia, not only the most populous, but the most beautiful city in America.—Leader.

Nathaniel H. Claiborne of Virginia who died a few weeks ago, belonged to a family that has furnished many members of congress, viz.: 1. Col. Thomas Claiborne of Brunswick, Va., over twenty years a member. 2. Wm. C. C. Claiborne (brother of deceased), first a representative from Tenn., then Governor of Mississippi, Governor-General of the Province of Louisiana, Governor of the Territory of Orleans, Governor of the State of Louisiana, and first United States Senator from that State. 3. Dr. John Claiborne, successor to his father, Col. Thomas Claiborne. 4. Thomas Claiborne of Nashville Tenn. 5. Nathaniel H. Claiborne of Virginia. 6. John F. H. Claiborne of Mississippi. Of the same family, on the maternal side, may be noted Benjamin Watkins Leigh, the great lawyer and Senator of Virginia; Willie P. Mangum, for so many years a distinguished Senator from North Carolina; Clement C. Clay, Jr., Governor of Alabama, and Senator from that State; now represented in the Senate by his gifted and eloquent son, Clement C. Clay, Jr.; William Leigh, a distinguished jurist of Halifax County, Va., and numerous other eminent men.

We learn from the Courrier des Etats Unis that one of the actresses of the new French troupe is here because she quarrelled with the stage manager of the theatre where she was playing in Paris, and gave him a smashing slap in the face while on the stage. Stage managers please take notice.

Some days since Mrs. Mary Bridger, an Indian lady, died at her residence near Little Santa Fe, in the county. Her husband is out on Government business in some of the territories, and it is not known where a letter will reach him; hence it is mentioned in your paper, which reaches all parts of the western country.—Mrs. Bridger was the wife of James Bridger, formerly of Bridger's Fort, Utah Territory.

Our readers must excuse the lack of editorial matter in our present issue, engagements have prevented us from devoting much attention to our paper the past week.

We have been permitted by P. K. son, Esq., to make the following extract from a letter from David Burr, 12 miles west of the Big Blue of the ult.:

"We pass Pike's Peak emigrants, and every one speaks favorably of it." Mr. Burr also states in his letter that the prairies in the vicinity of his letter was written, were on fire, that it was difficult to find grass, and that the settlements had greatly multiplied along the line of the road within the past year.

The numerous friends here of Mr. and the other gentlemen accompanying him will be glad to learn that their has been a prosperous one, and that was so near being completed when I wrote.

The statement contained in our paper two or three weeks ago, to the effect that Horace Greeley, while in this city, remaining a week at the house of a gentleman as his guest charged him two dollars on leaving for subscription to the Y Tribune, was not communicated to the gentleman whose guest he was, was the publication in any way authorized or sanctioned by him. We make this statement as an act of justice, and to correct a possible wrong impression that the article in question proceeded in any way from the gentleman with whom Mr. Greeley stopped. The facts were derived from an entirely different source.

A TRIPLE MARRIAGE.—On the 21st inst., Dr. W. H. Hopson married three sisters, Misses Zerilda, Margaret and D. Maria Breashear, daughters of Mr. Thomas Breashear of Palmyra, to Messrs C. T. Dixon of Palmyra, T. B. Kemner of Sheehana, and E. Mansoor of Chillicothe, all under one ceremony. This is what might be called a wholesale marriage in one family.

We saw, a week or two ago, walking down Main Street from the direction of the "President's Office," a man accompanied by four ladies. An air of slight perturbation in the party was indicated by certain expressions of satisfaction and happiness, led us to inquire who they were? Some one present informed us that they were a party that had been up to President Young's office to be married; and that the four ladies had just been united by the solemn bonds to the man accompanying them. That, we suppose, might be termed marriage in gross.

A WONDERFUL ILLUSTRATION.—Pious men are sometimes reduced to curious shifts for illustrations to their sermons. A Methodist exhorter lately made, in his supplication to the Throne of Mercy an invocation to God "to roll the ball of Salvation over the souls of the people of Napa like Rondo Balla over the smooth surface of a billiard table!" He must have been peeping, we think, in ungodly holes on the outside, or trying his luck on the "inside." He reminds us of a pious old Deacon, who used to inspire us with so much awe by sanctity of his manner that we dare not say our own was our own while in Church. Deacon F. came to California, and was tempted after sinful gains. A friend and member of the same Church, found him one night "bucking at Monte." With holy horror he nudged the absorbed player into a knowledge of his presence. "Deacon, do I find you gambling?" With ready wit to relieve him from his embarrassment, he chuckled—"No, no, friend S., not gambling! You see, this is a corrupt institution, and I am doing my best to break it up!" His friend thought so.—Napa reporter.

Mrs. PARTINGTON'S IDEA OF BOSTON.—From Mrs. Partington's new book, "Knitting Work," we learn that when the old lady had selected a guardian for Ike, and had come to the city to put the mischievous youth under the care of old Roger, she was heard to remark: "How the world has turned about to be sure," said she, "it's nothing but chance, chance! Only yesterday, as it were, I was in the country smelling the odious flowers; today I am in Boston, my oil factories breathing the impure exhalations of coal-smoke that are so dilatory to health. Instead of the singing of birds, the blunderbusses almost deprive me of consciousness. Dear me! Well, I hope I shall be restrained through it all. They say that the moral turpentine of this city is frightful, but it isn't any use to anticipate trouble beforehand; he may escape all harmonious influence that would have a tenderness to hurt him, and as the minister of our parish said, with judicial training he may become a useful member of society; though training is bad generally, and is apt to make the young run to feathery, like cropple-crowned hens. But he has genius—looking at him it comes natural to him, like the measles, and every day it is enveloping itself more and more."

The Louisville Journal says that the Mormons are all in favor of Mr. Douglas for the Presidency. They are emphatically squatter sovereignty men. They want no outside powers or influence interfering with their polygamy, or any of their other institutions.

Discovery of a New and Shorter Route from Utah to California.

The following letter from Capt. J. H. Simpson, we copy from the National Intelligencer of October the 8th. From the itinerary of Capt. Simpson, published in the Valley Tan some months since, the public have already been made somewhat familiar with the new route opened to California, by that energetic and accomplished officer. But the present letter will be read with interest apart from any additional information in regard to the route explored by Captain Simpson:

CAMP ON THE SWEET WATER, 320 miles from Camp Floyd, en route for Fort Leavenworth, Sept. 6, 1859.

MY DEAR BROTHER: When I last wrote to you, May 17th, I was with my party in Ruby Valley, two hundred and thirty-four miles from Camp Floyd, exploring the country for a new wagon route to Carson Valley, there to connect with a well-known route over the Sierra Nevada to California. We reached Genoa, in Carson Valley, at the east foot of the Sierra Nevada, June 12th, having conducted our wagons, fourteen in number, across valleys and through mountain passes with much less difficulty than we had anticipated, and obtaining a good road. By this new route the travelling distance between Camp Floyd and California has been shortened about two hundred and fifty miles, and a much better road, in respect to the great essentials wood, water, and grass, than the old St. Mary's or Humboldt river route, with which the comparison is made, evolved. If the comparison be made with the present post route, which is an extension as far as Ruby Valley of my route of last fall, the difference in favor of my late route is about one hundred and forty-four miles.

The people of Genoa were highly pleased with the result of the expedition, and honored our entry into their little town by the firing of cannon and in giving us a social entertainment. The good people of the interior of California, particularly in Placerville and Sacramento, were also highly delighted, and could not express too strongly their sense of the value which the new route is destined to be to them.

While my party lay recruiting at Genoa I made a flying visit to San Francisco, Major Frederic Dodge, the Indian agent in that region, and lately, I believe, elected delegate to advocate before Congress the erection of that portion of Utah into a Territory, accompanying me. We left Genoa June 12th, and arrived at San Francisco June 15th. From Genoa, over the Sierra Nevada, to Placerville, eighty miles, we rode on mules; thence to Folsom, twenty-seven miles, we traveled in stylish stages, drawn by handsome fleet horses; thence to Sacramento, twenty-three miles, by steam car; and thence to San Francisco, one hundred and twenty miles, by steamboat. The stages, railroad cars, and steamboat were equal to any I have seen in the Atlantic States; and what shall I say of the country I passed through? Words fail to express my admiration of its fertility, beauty, and value. Persons like myself, who have traveled much on the arid plains intervening between the States bordering the Missouri and California, are apt to be impressed, from the constantly recurring scene of sandy desert wastes, as you proceed westward, that this character of country obtains all the way to the Pacific. But this, much to my gratification, I found not to be the case. Præsto, as soon as you place your foot on the Sierra Nevada a new order of nature appears. The eternal sage bush, (artemisia), of which you have not for a day been out of sight since you left the Rocky Mountains, and the scrub cedar, which is the principle tree, disappear entirely, and in their stead lofty pines and firs become the characteristics. These attain an enormous size, the former being frequently seen as much as eight feet in diameter. The streams are more numerous, and appear as pure gushing rapids or cataracts, leaping over precipices, or beautiful limpid streams, gladdening the valleys and expanding themselves in beautiful lakes. And then as you descend the Sierra on the west side, the large umbrageous oak gradually takes the place of the pine, and becomes the gem of the landscape. These, existing in clusters or solitary, and disposed in the beautifully irregular and delightful manner in which nature throws her ornaments, and among wheat fields of the greatest amplitude and of the most rich, luxuriant, and fruitful growth, surrounded too by broad fences of a plain but neat character, form a combination of the most pleasing character.

And, then, the gradually level character which the country assumes, as you approach the Sacramento Valley; the neat farm-houses, which appear almost as frequently as in our older and most populous States; the ugly feature, so common in the older States, of old stumps of trees marring the scene, no where being visible; all these characteristics have so indelibly and impressively charmed me that I shall ever regard the transition from the east to the west side of the Sierra Nevada as the most marked in my life.

But I am dwelling too long on this theme. California, I can only say, is, as I believe, destined to be a great, if not the greatest, State in the Union. Her towns and cities vie with any east of the Rocky Mountains, and her population, like her soil, teems with a vigor which can only be comprehended by those who have been in her midst. The people of the East can have no conception of the progress this young sister of the Confederacy has made in all the elements which go to make up a happy, powerful, and efficient State. The secret is in her climate, her soil, her productions, vegetable, cereal, mineral; her splendid rivers, her lovely scenery, her magnificent harbor of San Francisco, her relatedness to the commerce of the Indies and China, and the so-called Eastern World generally; all these have made her what she is, and as she grows in age so will all these advantages continue to cause her to grow in wealth and power.

We spent two days in San Francisco and one (the Sabbath) in Sacramento most agreeably. In the latter place I saw a number of Jerseymen, among them a couple of Brunswickers, (old friends, one a schoolmate,) both of them in positions of honor and usefulness. Major Dodge and myself attended the services and heard preaching in the Episcopal Church, and were delighted with the taste displayed in the material of the building as well as the good order, propriety, and efficiency of the services. The singing was excellent.

On the 23d of June we reached Genoa, on our return, and the next day I started back with my party for Camp Floyd. On this my return trip I only occasionally at the outset touched my outward route, much the greater portion of it being again entirely new, and from twenty-five to forty miles south of the other. I am happy to inform you that, though in our outward route we were quite successful, as I have already stated, in our inward we were still more so. In distance there was no advantage gained; but in respect to wood, water, grass and grade the road is far preferable. This is the route I have recommended emigrants to take, and already a number of trains, as also a large herd of cattle, have taken it. I have had itineraries of it prepared and published in the Salt Lake City and California papers. Heretofore about twenty-five per cent. of the stock driven over the old Humboldt route have died from insufficiency and poisonous grass and water. On the new route there need be no deaths from this cause. The saving to the country from this source alone will be immense.

I could say much of the ignorance which has prevailed in relation to the country we have traversed; of the idea which has obtained that it was an unmitigated desert, over which man or beast could not venture without the prospect of certain death. But I am already swelling this letter, I fear, to a tedious length; suffice it, therefore, to say that on our most southern route, where it was supposed the desert would be encountered in its greatest poverty, we found the best soil, most luxuriant grass, (in places fine clover,) the most abundant timber, and the purest and most reliable water.

The plan I pursued was to send my guide party with ten days' provisions ahead, and whilst confining them, independent of existing trails, to the examination of passes, water courses, springs, and grass within certain limits, agreeably to a predetermined direction, based upon known data of longitude and latitude, every twenty-four hours in the day or night one of the party was sent back to inform me of the country ahead, so that with scarcely an exception we traveled every day with the precision of certainty, and with the constant assurance we were evolving the best route the country afforded.

Twice we had come to nearly a dead halt on account of reports from the guide party of impracticable passes ahead, and once I had to run back twenty miles to keep the stock from perishing for want of water and grass; but further examinations which I directed caused the difficulties to disappear, and literally, as one of the party remarked, the passes seemed to open out to us as we advanced. On one occasion the animals were without water for sixty hours, and when they did drink could not be generally satisfied with less than eight buckets full. I am assured that one of them in the course of a few hours drank fourteen buckets full. Of course we were prudent enough not to let them drink this much at once, but before they were satisfied they drank as much as I have stated. This occurred on our return, when we were exploring the Great Salt Lake desert. Indeed on this occasion to get them to water at all they had to be driven after dark, in a severe thunder storm, some twelve miles. In the pitchy darkness and amongst thick cedars the herd separated into two, the more strong pushing ahead and the weaker lagging behind; and while one portion went twelve miles another went eighteen. They however were got together the second day after. At this time I began to fear that the expedition, at least on its return trip, was about to fail; but thanks to a kind Providence, while all those difficulties were being endured, the water and grass were eventually discovered, and so related in locality as subsequently to be connected by a direct line of road; and thus another great objection to the Utah route, to California, the Great Salt Lake desert, very greatly mitigated, if not entirely obviated.

In this connexion I must not omit to mention the good Samaritan, in the shape of an Indian some fifty-five years of age, who, though a cripple, occasioned by a fall from a horse some years ago, and only capable of self-locomotion by the support of his hands in a sitting posture, yet, in the goodness of his heart, while we were in this sad extremity about water, manifested the greatest consideration for us, and actually, with his hearty consent, suffered himself to be taken up bodily and put on a mule and rode as a guide to the water twelve miles off in the night referred to. The next day he returned to our camp, full of exclamations of delight at again seeing us, but so exhausted that when he was taken off his mule and carried to the fire his only cry was, "water, water," which was immediately furnished him. A good supper was gotten for him which he partook of heartily; but some "Schlemm Schnappe," which was offered to him as a restorative, he persistently refused to drink, saying in his way, "it was no good;" but showing by rubbing his thigh and pointing to the spirits that he wanted it applied in that way; which of course was done. In addition to all this which he did for us, he had permitted his son, apparently his only support, to go with my guide party several days in advance to show the water, grass, and mountain passes. Of course, all this disinterestedness, coupled as it was with his crippled condition, made us all very grateful to him, and we felt that we could not give enough in return. Among other things, one of my party prepared a pair of crutches for him to walk with; but alas! when I had him lifted up and the crutches applied under his shoulders, we perceived that he was paralyzed in both legs, and could not put either foot to the ground. He was so treated like a king that he could not understand it; and would every once in a while look at us and laugh outright with astonishment and joy. The spring where his wick-ke-up (habitation) is I have called, therefore "the good Indian spring;" and it is at this point where I have, by Gen. Johnston's direction, established four large watering troughs, which were subsequently carried from Camp Floyd for the benefit of emigrants and travelers generally.

But the animals were not the only sufferers on the trip. Our chief guide was for two days without any thing so eat, and when he did come in was so much exhausted from fatigue, his mule having given out, that he supported himself with a couple of canes or sticks, and when we came up to him sank helplessly into a sage bush. He was offered some fine fat rats by some Digger Indians he met; but having been roasted with entrails and all in them, he said he was not quite hungry enough to accept of their hospitality. The Indian Ute, "Pete," one of Dr. Hurt's faithful Indians, who stuck to him to the last on his flight from Mormon desperadoes, and who, thanks to the doctor, was my interpreter (and a most faithful and intelligent adjunct he proved to be to the expedition) in a laudable attempt to find an Indian who had been of great service to us in our outward trip; went to the mail station in Battle Valley, on the post route where he lived; but finding the spring there dried up and the station abandoned to was of necessity four days and three nights without food. A dragon, on account of his horse giving out, was two days and nights without food. But now that our explorations have been successful, all these hardships and hardships are only referred to as reminiscences of an usual kind, on that account none the less interesting.

I arrived at Camp Floyd on my return from Genoa on the 3d of this month; my party on the 5th. On the 9th I left for Fort Leavenworth, my instructions from Gen. Johnston having been to explore on my way a new pass from the valley of the Timpanogos to the Vinta river valley, for the purpose of getting a new and more direct wagon route to the States from Camp Floyd than any we now have. I found the pass favorable, and if, during the next season, a pass can be found through the east range of the rocky mountains correspondingly favorable, the end in view will be gained. Even as it is, it is certain that the route to the States by the Cochetopa pass can now be shortened probably about eighty miles. I also on my way to Fort Bridger examined the country to the south of the Timpanogos and White Clay creek route of last fall from Camp Floyd to see if I could not improve it; but although I found favorable mountain passes which would shorten the road from seven to twelve miles, yet the advantages and disadvantages are such as probably not to make it expedient to modify the route.

We are now hastening to Fort Leavenworth, thence to Washington, whence I shall be glad once more to visit my relatives and friends in the vicinity.

Very affectionately, your brother

J. H. SIMPSON.

The Arctic Revelations.

The veil which so long hung over the fate of Sir John Franklin, and his unfortunate comrades has at last been rent asunder. Nine years at least have already elapsed since all hope of their return was lost, but the despair of seeing them alive and again the interest felt by everybody in their fate, the desire to know where, how and when they met it—by which of the thousand dangers which they braved, and on what spot of the awful wastes which they undertook to explore. There was something terribly tantalizing in the disappearance of two ships-of-war, manned by full crews, and provided with everything which could give them a chance of safety within the frozen wilderness, whose secret two centuries of courageous endeavor on the part of the greatest maritime nations of the world, and of unbroken fortitude on the part of the explorers they employed, have not sufficed to reveal. There is hardly a man of this generation whom the noble story of Arctic explorations has not moved to the depths of his soul, and Franklin was one of the ablest, oldest and bravest men who had trodden that perilous path. For nearly ten years he himself has occupied in all our eyes the place of interest which he had previously assigned to natural mysteries which he sailed to unfold. He has himself, during that period, been sought with more courage and more devotion, with deeper fortitude or holier enthusiasm, than those he or his predecessors ever displayed, great as their heroism undoubtedly was, in the search for the Northwest passage. It is but two years since the United States sent on his track a man of whom the age may well be proud, and of whom his country may well boast as long as religious heroism is a thing to boast of. Only two winters ago, around every fire-side in England as well as here, there were eyes wet with tears over Kane's noble record of the long Arctic night through which he watched in the brave hope that he might tell the world where Franklin and his men had perished, and we had hardly done perusing it when Kane himself died in the cause. The world had well nigh despaired of ever getting another ray of light thrown on the mystery. The ships had sailed away into the frozen seas. Eight years of pursuit had brought no better traces of the expedition than a few graves, a few instruments, a few vague Esquimaux rumors; and the public had almost been reconciled to the pain of uncertainty as to the exact nature of its fate, by the perfect certainty which time had brought that no member of it was now living. Happily, Lady Franklin hoped against hope, was proof against demonstration and against failure; and when both England and America had recoiled from the icy barrier in despair, she launched one more ship on the track. It was a small screw steamer, commanded by Capt. McClintock, manned by 23 men, and, as the result proves, all worthy of one another and of the duty they undertook. This last reserve of a wife's devotion has done what all else failed to accomplish. The fate of Franklin and his ships and men is at last known. He died twelve years ago. A year after the two ships were abandoned, and the surviving crews—105 men in all—started on their march southward over the ice. They perished miserably, man by man, along the frozen waste, and

There was but one thing wanting to have made this Franklin expedition worthy of as noble an epic as that which has immortalized the fall of Troy and the conquest of Jerusalem—and that was that the man who laid bare the mystery which has perplexed us for twelve years should be worthy of the men in whose footsteps he followed; and we are glad to say, this, too, has been vouchsafed us. The story of Capt. McClintock's wanderings, as told in his own narrative, forms a worthy close to this great tragedy. There are incidents calmly recorded in it which no tale of adventure has supplied anything to surpass, and which we hope will be mentioned with honor as long as courageous devotion to duty, in the face of the most appalling perils, finds anybody to admire it. Our age is, after all, the age of chivalry. The march of Christian civilization may have turned the fire which precipitates a murderous shock, but it has fed the calmer and nobler heroism which, for duty's sake, supports the hardest strain, and fiercest struggle, and sorest trial, not for an hour, or for a day, but for weeks, and months, and years.

As to the English version of the Bible, we venerate it as much as we do any uninspired monument of human wisdom and labor. It stands in our literature as do many of the venerable cathedrals of England in architecture, which have through successive periods gathered upon themselves every religious style known to the island, so that they are not merely monumental churches, but histories as well, and memorials of sacred architecture. And yet, in all their beauty and grandeur, they are not put beyond criticism, nor invested in any such superstitious sanctity as shall make the expression of an honest opinion a sin.

And so it is with the English version of God's Word. We revere it as the most precious gift of God to our literature. And yet, as a translation, noble as a whole, it has in detail its many faults, which the whole world do know. And to speak of them is not to set oneself up either as an instructor of David, or a censor of the translators, but simply to exercise the rights which belong to every honest man whose business calls him to express an opinion upon such things.

THE PRESENT POPULATION OF PHILADELPHIA.—If we needed any other evidence of the great growth of Philadelphia, than the extent of ground which has been covered with houses since the last census, we shall find it in the fact just revealed by the labor of Mr. Cohen, in marking up the City Directory of Philadelphia. He has gone sufficiently far into that work to show that the population of Philadelphia at the present time is 680,000 persons—an increase of 271,233 persons since the last census, taken nine years ago, or about 66 1-3 per cent. The increase for the previous ten years was 53 3-4 per cent. The increase of population, therefore, has been eight per cent. greater in the last nine years than it was in the previous ten.

Philadelphia, with the exception of London and Paris, has a population larger, perhaps, than any other European city. It has 135,000 more inhabitants than New York had at the last census—543,000; though that city, like Philadelphia, has largely increased its population since that time, and probably numbers 750,000 at this time. The large increase in the population of Philadelphia is doubtless owing to the spread of its manufacturing. No city in the Union is more largely and variously engaged in this branch of productive industry. This, with the vast mineral resources of the State, developed by Philadelphia capital, is the great source of its prosperity and its wealth, and in making Philadelphia, not only the most populous, but the most beautiful city in America.—Larger.

Nathaniel H. Claiborne of Virginia who died a few weeks ago, belonged to a family that has furnished many members of congress, viz.: 1. Col. Thomas Claiborne of Brunswick, Va., over twenty years a member. 2. Wm. C. Claiborne (brother of deceased), first a representative from Tenn., then Governor of Mississippi, Governor-General of the Province of Louisiana, Governor of the Territory of Orleans, Governor of the State of Louisiana, and first United States Senator from that State. 3. Dr. John Claiborne, successor to his father, Col. Thomas Claiborne. 4. Thomas Claiborne of Nashville Tenn. 5. Nathaniel H. Claiborne of Virginia. 6. John F. H. Claiborne of Mississippi. Of the same family, on the maternal side, may be noted Benjamin Watkins Leigh, the great lawyer and Senator of Virginia; Willie P. Mangum, for so many years a distinguished Senator from North Carolina; Clement C. Clay, sr., Governor of Alabama, and Senator from that State, now represented in the Senate by his gifted and eloquent son, Clement C. Clay, jr.; William Leigh, a distinguished jurist of Halifax County, Va., and numerous other eminent men.

We learn from the Courrier des Etats that one of the actresses of the new French troupe is here because she quarrelled with the stage manager of the theatre where she was playing in Paris, and gave him a smashing slap in the face while on the stage. Stage managers please take notice.

Some days since Mrs. Mary Bridger, an Indian lady, died at her residence near Little Santa Fe, in the county. Her husband is out on Government business in some of the territories, and it is not known where a letter will reach him; hence it is desired that the sad occurrence be mentioned in your paper, which reaches all parts of the western country.—Mrs. Bridger was the wife of JAMES BRIDGER, formerly of Bridger's Fort, Utah Territory.

Our readers must excuse the lack of editorial matter in our present issue; our engagements have prevented us from devoting much attention to our paper during the past week.

We have been permitted by P. E. Benson, Esq., to make the following statement from a letter from David Burr, Esq., written from Coltonwood creek twenty miles west of the Big Blue of the Missouri—

"We pass Pike's Peak emigrants daily, and every one speaks favorably of mines." Mr. Burr also states in his letter that the Prairie in the vicinity from which his letter was written, were on fire and that it was difficult to find grass; that along the settlements had greatly multiplied the line of the road within the past year.

The numerous friends here of Mr. Benson and the other gentlemen accompanying him will be glad to learn that his trip has been a prosperous one, and that he was so near being completed when he wrote.

The statement contained in our paper, two or three weeks ago, to the effect that Horace Greeley, while in this city, after remaining a week at the house of a gentleman as his guest, charged him two dollars on leaving for subscription to the Y Tribune, was not communicated to the gentleman whose guest he was, nor was the publication in any way authorized or sanctioned by him. We regret the statement as an act of justice, and correct a possible wrong impression that the article in question proceeded in any way from the gentleman with whom Mr. Greeley stopped. The facts were derived from an entirely different source.

A TRIPLE MARRIAGE.—On the 21st inst., Dr. W. H. Hopsan married three sisters, Misses Zerilda, Margaret and Marias Breshers, daughters of Mr. Thomas Breshers of Palmyra, to Messrs C. L. Dixon of Palmyra, T. B. Kemper of Sheehana, and E. Mansor of Chillicothe, all under one ceremony. This is the might be called a wholesale marriage in one family.

We saw, a week or two ago, walking down Main Street from the direction of the "President's Office," a man accompanied by four ladies. An air of slight perturbation in the party manifested with evident expressions of satisfaction and happiness, led us to inquire who they were. Some one present informed us that they were a party that had been up to President Young's office to be married and that the formal bonds had been dissolved, and that the bonds to the man accompanying them. That, we suppose, might be termed marriage in gross.

A WORLDLY ILLUSTRATION.—Pious men are sometimes reduced to curious shifts for illustrations to their sermons. A Methodist exhorter lately made, in his supplication to the Throne of Mercy an invocation to God "to roll the ball of Salvation over the souls of the people of Napa Valley Rondo Ball" over the smooth surface of a billiard table! He must have been peering, we think, in ungodly holes on the outside, or trying his luck on the "inside." He reminds us of a pious old Deacon, who used to inspire us with so much awe in sanctity of his manner that we dare not say our soul was our own while in Church. Deacon F. came to California, and was tempted after sinful gains. A friend at member of the same Church, found him one night "bucking at Monte." With a horror he nudged the absorbed player into a knowledge of his presence. "Deacon, do I find you gambling?" With a will to relieve him from his embarrassment, he chuckled. "No, no, friend S., not gambling! You see, this is a corrupt institution, and I am doing my best to break it up!" His friend thought so.—Napa reporter.

Mrs. PARRINGTON'S LOZA OR BURN.—From Mrs. Parrington, a new book, "Knitting Work," we learn that when the old lady had selected a guardian for Ike, and had come to the city to put the mischievous youth under the care of old Roger, who was heard to remark, "How the world has turned about to be sure," said she; "it's nothing but change, change." Only yesterday, as it were, I was in the country smelling the odious flowers; today I am in Boston, my oil factories breathing the impure exhalations of coal smoke that are so dilatory to health. Instead of the singing of birds, the blunderbusses almost deprive me of consciousness. Dear me! Well, I hope I shall be restrained through it all. They say that the moral turpentine of this city is frightful, but it isn't any use to anticipate trouble beforehand; be you escape all harmonious influence that would have a tenderness to hurt him, and as the minister of our parish said, with judicial training he may become a useful member of society; though training is bad generally, and is apt to make the young run to feathers, like croppie-crowned hens. But he has genius—looking at him—it comes natural to him, like the measles, and every day it is enveloping itself more and more."

The Louisville Journal says that the Mormons are all in favor of Mr. Douglas for the Presidency. They are emphatically squatter sovereignty men. They want no outside powers or influence interfering with their polygamy, or any of their other institutions.

Late and Bloody News.

Indian depredations on the Plains— Massacre of one Mail Party, and apprehensions for the safety of another.

Intelligence of a most painful character has just reached us, which has thrown our community into more than usual excitement. Messengers reached here yesterday, confirming previous rumors of an attack by the Indians upon a Santa Fe mail train and the murder of at least two persons accompanying it. Mr. Patterson, from Walnut Creek, (a reliable gentleman,) brought us the first intelligence, and Mr. Cole, of this county—who was with the train when attacked—arrived a few hours later with fuller details. From these gentlemen we gather the following facts:

Some weeks ago the desperate Comanche Chief, Buffalo Hump, with some of his braves, appeared among the Kiowas, and was observed to be in frequent consultations with them. The Kiowas have been dissatisfied and threatening toward the whites during all the summer, and it was supposed that the mission of Buffalo Hump was to stir up their anger to violence. No overt act of hostility occurred however, until the 20th ult., when a squabble took place at Rickman's Ranch between some Kiowas and whites about a horse swap, resulting in a skirmish and the death of an Indian. The other Indians went off swearing vengeance, and soon collected a war party.

Three days after, (on the 23d of September,) a mail train going out—the one which left here on Monday the 19th of September—was surrounded by a band of Kiowa warriors, near the crossing of Pawnee Fork, some 25 miles beyond Cow Creek, and about 250 miles from Westport. The Indians demanded "toll," and the conductor dealt out to them sugar, coffee, and a portion of such other articles as he had, but without satisfying them. They took all that was given them and then, raising a whoop, they fired into the stage, perfectly riddling it with bullets and arrows, instantly killing the two Smiths, driver and conductor, and wounding the only other occupant, Mr. Cole. The Smiths were killed before they had a chance to fire, but Cole leaped from the stage when wounded, fired his pistol, saw an Indian fall and the others gathered around him, and in the confusion that ensued, escaped some distance and hid in the brush. The Indians finding their companion dead, mounted their horses and proceeded in search of their missing enemy. One of the horsemen passed within a few feet of where Cole lay, but failed to discover him. He saw them return to the scene of conflict, abuse the bodies of his fallen friends, strip them of their clothing, and rip open and scatter the contents of the newspaper mail bag. Fortunately they missed the letter mail bag, which was afterward recovered and taken to Rickman's Ranch.

When the mail train arrived at Rickman's Ranch, and the conductor and the driver of the killing of the Indians some days before, and the exasperated feelings of the tribe, he engaged an escort which accompanied the mail some twenty odd miles and then returned, supposing they had passed beyond danger. But it seems that the Indians had kept along in sight, and waited for a chance of attack, for the mail and a half when the mail coach was surrounded and the men murdered.

Cole lay all night concealed in the brush, and next morning wandered out until he came up to a camp of the Peakers, from whom he received an escort to a trading post, and thence proceeded homeward. He passed through here some hours before he reached his family in Independence. The Santa Fe mail train that was here on Tuesday last, has not yet returned, and no intelligence of its whereabouts. It is believed by Mr. Cole and others that it has shared the fate of the outgoing train. It is about due, preceded on to Independence and attack it. This apprehension carries poignant grief to many citizens, as it is known that passengers were to have come on the train. From letters received here it is thought that Judge Crenshaw, of Independence, and passengers with this train. It is reported that they were armed and in neighborhood of some government buildings who are reported to be on the transit from Fort Union to Fort Riley, which may be their protection. At least we will hope for the best until we hear the worst.

Gemeous John Bull and the Unreasonable Yankee.

When the news recently arrived in England that our Minister to China and the commander of one of our ships of war not only committed the imprudent step of giving aid and comfort to the British when they had declared their hostile intentions against the Chinese, who were our friends, but were guilty of the outrageous course of taking an active part in the ill-starred assault of the British squadron against the Chinese forts, not only those foolish Americans were the finest fellows in the world, but all Americans were lauded to the skies: "Were the English children of the same mothers as the Americans they could not have received more sympathy and kindness than they met with from the Americans." "Blood is thicker than water," said commander Tannall, "and in a hundred different ways he and all his people acted up to this homely proverb." "The American crew forgot themselves and thought only of the British." "A few days after the fight the Chinese junk brought provisions to the Powhatan. These were immediately sent to the British wounded." "The bond of American brotherhood was indeed deeply cemented in the trial of the British at the Peiho."

Such are the testimonies borne by eye witnesses whose letters appeared in the English papers, and in commenting on them the London Times observes: "Whatever may be the result of the fight, England will never forget the day when the deeds and words of kindly Americans sustained and comforted her stricken warriors on the waters of the Peiho." In fact it was generally agreed that the entente cordiale between the two nations would endure as long as the sun and moon. But alas! how soon is all this reversed. In a day or two after the news arrived of General Harney's occupation of San Juan, the island in the vicinity of Vancouver, which John Bull covets and claims as his own, but which clearly belongs to the United States. The tone of the British press is suddenly changed. The news from China is ignored, and ecstatic editorials on the subject are forgotten. No term to be found in Jonson's dictionary is hard enough to be applied to General Harney and the American people generally. "Pirates" and "licensed ruffians of the American army," are the mild epithets used, and we are actually threatened with an immediate British war if the act of General Harney is not speedily disavowed by our government, and the island evacuated.

Perhaps it would be better for John Bull to finish off the Chinese war, before he gets an American war on his hands. We are not at all alarmed at the menaces of the English press. It may bluster and fume, but the last thing the British government will dream of is to enter upon a 3d American war. Washington's First Love.

A correspondent of the "Century," in giving some reminiscences of the old country seat called "The Cottage," in Hanover county, Virginia, relates the following account of Gen. Washington's proposal for the hand of Mary Cary, and his rejection by her father:

"Her father was Wilson Cary, Esq., of 'Celeys,' in the county of Elizabeth city, descended from the noble family of Hundson, in England. His relative, Colonel Archibald Cary, of Amphith, in Chesterfield, was, at his death, the heir apparent to the Earldom. The worthy old gentleman seems, from all we know of him, to have been as proud as the Coucy or the Somersets, and to have thought his family the noblest in the land. He lived in great state, with chariot and horses, plate and velvet and embroidery—a worthy of the school, fully satisfied with the 'order of things,' and enjoying serenely the good gifts of Providence. His beautiful daughter was a great heiress, and had many suitors. The one here alluded to was a young man of very high character, a relative of George William Fairfax, Esq., who lived in Belvoir, on the Potomac, and here he met with Miss Cary, who came to visit Mrs. Fairfax, her eldest sister. He at once proceeded to fall in love, which he did with an ardor characteristic of his nature."

"When Miss Cary went back home to 'Celeys,' on James river, he followed her like a courageous gallant, and laid open siege to the fair fortress. In the good old times, however, something more was necessary than the consent of the young lady, and so the youth duly asked a private interview with the old lord of the manor, who listened to him throughout. When the lover had finished, Mr. Cary rose, made a low bow, and said: 'that if this was young Mr. Washington's errand at 'Celeys,' his visit had better terminate—his daughter had been accustomed to ride in her own chariot. And with this allusion to the poor condition of the younger son, the interview terminated. Young Washington bowed and turned away, and in due time married the young widow, Martha Dandridge Custis, who resembled Miss Cary," says an authority, "as much as one sister ever did another."

"The old tradition does not end here. Many years fled away—Mary Cary was Mrs. Ambler, and her discarded suitor was the man who had just received the sword of Cornwallis at Yorktown, whom the whole civilized world hailed as the greatest among the great—the foremost man, not only in America, but of 'all the world.' He passed through the old metropolis, Williamsburg, at the head of his victorious troops; and the people were almost crazy with joy and adoration. The vast multitude nearly prevented his horse from proceeding; the calm statue on horseback passed on serenely. All at once he perceived at a window, or in the crowd, his old love, Mary Cary. He raised his sword and saluted her profoundly. She fainted."

"But it does not seem that the lovely woman was to blame. She had not been able to return the affection of the youth—that was all. She married him who won her heart, Edward Ambler. He was not unworthy of this noble lady in rank or character. He was descended through his mother from the Huguenot house of la Roche Jaqueline, in Vendee, and inherited the honest instincts of his race. At twelve years of age he had been sent for his education to England. He graduated at Cambridge, and then made the grand tour of Europe, returning to Virginia when he was twenty-one. He was married to Miss Cary soon afterward; became collector of York; and was so much respected that when Lord Botetourt came to Virginia as Governor he brought a letter of introduction to the collector. He died at thirty-five; and the Revolutionary war breaking out soon afterward, his beautiful widow moved away from the scene of her grief, and took refuge in the 'Cottage,' far up in Han-

What a Lady Thinks of Hairy Faces.

A disgusted female at Xenia, Ohio, is making a terrific crusade against hairy-faced men. Hear the lady:

What expression of kindness and mild humanity can be observed in a face covered with hair from the nose down? Not any. As well might a poor rat look in the grizzly muzzle of a Scotch terrier for mercy, when about to be caught in his crushing jaws, as to look for an expression of human kindness and sympathy in the face of a hirsute man.

Who can appreciate the value of a smile? It lightens up the countenance with adorning sweetness, indicates a kind heart, and radiates gladness to the hearts of others, encourages the desponding, soothes the afflicted, cheers the sorrowing, disarms wrath, and kindles up genial sympathy and reciprocal regard.

But a smile can not crop out from the face of a man "bearded," and must be "like the pard." You suppose, from the agitation of tall grass, that some animal was crawling through it. So you may infer, from the whisking of hair, that a smile was burrowing along there somewhere, out of sight. The smile of such a man can not be distinguished from the grin of a ribbed-nosed baboon, which had burnt its mouth with a hot chestnut.

The lips are capable of indicating a variety of passions and emotion. They can express kindness, good humor, sweetness of disposition, sorrow, firmness, and decision of character, or they may manifest scorn, contempt, disdain, loathing, anger, and threaten like loaded revolvers. The chief expression of the best traits in Napoleon's nature were in his mouth and chin, which he could clothe with so much sweet, winning, mute, persuasive eloquence as to render his look irresistible. But when lip and chin are covered with hair you might as well look for expression in the hole of a bank swallow in the side of a gully, overhung with a tuft of grass.

The passions and affections have their poles in the face, firmness in the upper lip, mirthfulness near the outer corners of the mouth, and the affections in the edges of the lips, &c., hence the philosophy and delight of kissing; the more intense the passion, the more soul-thrilling and enrapturing the kiss. Behold that lovely woman, with a form shaped by the hand of harmony, regular features under clustering ringlets, bright eyes beaming with intelligence, well-arranged pearly teeth, a soft and delicate skin, a mouth like Cupid's bow, a neck like ivory, a breast like alabaster, and the swelling undulations of love like snow, her lips like two rose-buds moist with morning dew, and her cheeks:

"When the live crimson through the native white, Shooting o'er the face, diffuses bloom— And every nameless grace." Radiant in the beauty, she is surrounded by an atmosphere of love, as a rose exhales fragrance. Just think of one of these hairy face fellows attempting to kiss her—see him pulling up his chevron-de-fres of bristles to reveal his wild, beast-looking, cavernous slit of a mouth. Bah! its abominable—the idea is disgusting—nauseous—get out—scat!

"Give us an ounce of civet, good apothecary, to sweeten my imagination."

REASON WHY THE JUDGE DIDN'T GET A "BITE."—Judge Bibb had been fishing all the morning without a nibble, having a live frog for a bait. A friend came along and said:

"Judge, let me catch a fresh bait for you. I see a frog on the bank close beside you."

"Thank you, sir; I wish you would catch that frog, sir. It's been staring me in the face all the morning. I believe it knows that I have one of its family on my hook. Ha! ha! ha! Catch it, sir; by all means, catch it."

Mr. D— sharpened his rod and cautiously striking with the sharp end, pinned the frog through one of its hinder legs. Just then, as Mr. D— was lifting aloft his prize, the Judge began winding up his reel, and uttered in a joyous cry: "Hold still, sir! keep quiet! I've got a bite!"

"Rapidly wound the reel, rapidly came in the slackening line, till the last few yards of it floated upon the surface of the stream; and then, with a face that boded thunder, the Judge turned to Mr. D—: "Why, sir, you've caught my frog."

And so it was. The frog, with the impulse of all amphibious animals when wounded, had made for the shore; and there it had crouched for four hours, directly under the Judge's nose, and holding his hook out of water.

The British National Debt.

A recent paper, published by order of the House of Commons, gives some interesting particulars respecting the national debt of Great Britain. It covers the whole period of this institution—for such it seems to be—from 1693 to the present time. The two extremes present these figures: In 1694, the year after the debt originated, the funded debt was £1,200,000, and in 1858-'59 the funded debt of Great Britain and Ireland amounted to £756,801,154. The interest on the former was £413,407, and on the latter £27,743,215. The unfunded debt at the former period was about five and a half millions sterling, and is at present somewhat over eighteen and a quarter millions. In round numbers, therefore, the present national debt of Great Britain is £805,000,000, or $4,025,000,000, paying over 138,000,000 interest. Great as this debt is, it has been larger. At the close of the Napoleonic war in 1815 it reached the almost incomprehensible sum of £860,000,000.

The history of the British national debt is substantially the history of British wars. The Times, in speaking of the accumulation of the debt, truly says: "There is war, and it immediately stirs; there is peace, and it stops; there is war, and it goes on again." Thus, the first war with France, after the beginning of the debt, added twenty thousand pounds; and the war with Spain, at the beginning of the last century, put on twenty thousand pounds more. The American war found the debt at £130,000,000 and left it at £240,000,000—so much money thrown away. All these additions were trifles compared with that which accrued from the wars with France at the close of the last and the beginning of the present centuries, and which nearly quadrupled the last mentioned figures. But, say the British writers, if the country surmounted and reduced the enormous debt of 1815, when manufactures and commerce were in their infancy, the present aspect of the matter, of course, affords no ground of apprehension, but rather of confidence and encouragement.

How to Pass a Counterfeit Note.—"I say Tom, here's a pretty good counterfeit three. If you will pass it, I will divide."

"Let's see the plaster," said Tom, and after examining it carefully, put it into his vest pocket, remarking: "It's an equal division, a dollar and a half apiece."

"Yes," said Ben.

"All right," said Tom, and off he went.

A few moments afterward he quietly stepped into the store of his friend Ben, purchased a can of oysters for one dollar and a half, laying down the three dollar note for them.

The clerk looked at the note rather doubtfully, when his suspicions were immediately calmed by Tom, who said, "there's no use looking, for he had received that note from Ben himself not ten minutes since."

Of course the clerk, with the assurance, immediately forked over the dollar and a half in change, and with this deposit and the can of oysters, Tom left. Shortly afterwards he met Ben, who asked him "if he had passed the note?" "O, yes," said Tom, "here's your share," at the same time passing over the dollar and a half to Ben.

That evening, when Ben made up his cash account, he was surprised to find the same old counterfeit three dollar note in the drawer. Turning to his "locum tenens," he asked:

"Where did you get this cursed note? Didn't you know it was a counterfeit?"

"Why," said the clerk, "Tom gave it to me, and I suspected it was fishy, but he said he had just received it from you, and I took it."

The whole thing had penetrated the wool of Ben. With a peculiar grin, he muttered "sold," and charged the can of oysters to profit and loss account.

THE WAY TO MAKE RESTORATION.—"Patrick, the widow Malony tells me that you have stolen one of her finest pigs. Is that so?"

"Yes, yer honor."

"What have you done with it?"

"Killed and ate it, yer honor."

"Oh, Patrick! when you are brought face to face with the widow and her pig, on the judgment day, what account will you be able to give of your self when the woman accuses you of the theft?"

Did you say the pig would be there, yer reverence?"

"To be sure I did."

"Well, then, yer reverence, I'll say, Mrs. Malony, the pig."

A young man in "these parts" who had spent a good deal of his own time and a good deal of his father's money in fitting for the bar, was asked after examination how he got along.

Indian depredations on the Plains—Massacre of one Mail Party, and apprehensions for the safety of another.

Intelligence of a most painful character has just reached us, which has given our community into more than excitement. Messengers reached here yesterday, confirming previous rumors of an attack by the Indians upon a Santa Fe mail train and the murder of at least two persons accompanying it. Mr. Patterson, from Creek, (a reliable gentleman) brought us the first intelligence, and Mr. Cole, of this county—who was with the train when attacked—arrived a few hours later with fuller details. From these gentlemen we gather the following facts:

Some weeks ago the desperate Comanche Chief, Buffalo Hump, with some of his braves, appeared among the Kiowas, and was observed to be in frequent consultations with them. The Kiowas have been dissatisfied and threatening toward the whites during all the summer, and it was supposed that the mission of Buffalo Hump was to stir up their anger to violence. An overt act of hostility occurred however, until the 20th ult., when a squabble took place at Rickman's Ranch between some Kiowas and whites
about a horse swap, resulting in a skinning and the death of an Indian. The other Indians went off swearing vengeance, and soon collected a war party.

Three days after, (on the 23d of September) a mail train going out—
the one which left here on Monday
the 19th of September—was surrounded by a band of Kiowa warriors,
near the crossing of Pawnee Fork,
some 25 miles beyond Cow Creek,
and about 250 miles from Westport.
The Indians demanded "toll," and the conductor dealt out to them sugar,
coffee, and a portion of such other articles as he had, but without satisfying them. They took all that was given demanded then, raising a whoop, they fired into the stage, perfectly riddling
it with bullets and arrows, instantly killing the two Smiths, driver and conductor, and wounding the only other occupant, Mr. Cole. The Smiths were killed before they had a chance to fire, but Cole leaped from the stage
when wounded, fired his pistol, saw an Indian fall and the others gather around him, and in the confusion that ensued, escaped some distance and hid in the grass. The Indians finding their companion dead, mounted their horses and proceeded in search of their missing enemy. One of the horsesman passed within a few feet
of where Cole lay, but failed to discover him. He saw them return to the scene of conflict, abuse the bodies of his fallen friends, strip them of their clothing, and rip open and scatter the contents of the newspaper mail
bag. Fortunately they missed the leather mail bag, which was afterward recovered and taken to Rickman's Ranch.

When the mail train arrived at Rickman's Ranch, and the conductor heard of the killing of the Indians
some days before, and the exasperated feelings of the tribe, he engaged an escort which accompanied the mail
some twenty odd miles and then returned, supposing they had passed beyond danger. But it seems that the Indians had kept along in sight, and waited for a chance of attack, for the escort had not departed more than an hour and a half when the mail coach was surrounded and the men murdered.

Cole lay all night concealed in the grass, and next morning wandered about until he came up to a camp of Pike's Peakers, from whom he received an escort to a trading post, and from thence proceeded homeward. He passed through here some hours since on his way to his family in Independence.

The Santa Fe mail train that was due here on Tuesday last, has not yet arrived, and no intelligence of its whereabouts. It is believed by Mr.
Cole and others that it has shared the fate of the out-going train. It is feared that the Indians, knowing it to be about due, preceeded on to intercept and attack it. This apprehension carries poignant grief to many of our citizens, as it is known that several passengers were to have come with the train. From letters received here it is thought that Judge Watts, with his son and son's wife,
and Mr. Crenshaw, of Independence, were passengers with this train. It may be that they were armed and in the neighborhood of some government troops, who are reported to be on the road, in transit from Fort Union to Fort Riley, which may be their protection. At least we will hope for the best until we hear the worst.

Generous John Bull and the Unreasonable Yankkees.

When the news recently arrived in England that our Minister to China and the commander of one of our ships of war not only committed the imprudent step of giving aid and comfort to the British when they had declared their hostile intentions against the Chinese, who were our friends,
but were guilty of the outrageous course of taking an active part in the ill-starred assault of the British squadron against the Chinese forts, not only those foolish Americans were the first fellows in the world, but all Americans were lauded to the skies: "Were the English children of the same mothers as the Americans they could not have received more sympathy and kindness than they met with from the Americans." "Blood is thicker than water," said commander Taitall, "and in a hundred different ways he and all his people acted up to this homely proverb." "The American crew forgot themselves and thought only of the British." "A few days after the fight the Chinese junk brought provisions to the Powhates. These were immediately sent to the British wounded." "The bond of American brotherhood was indeed deeply cemented in the trial of the British at the Pei-ho."

Such are the testimonies borne by eye witnesses whose letters appeared in the English papers, and in commenting on them the London Times observes:—"Whatever may be the result of the fight, England will never forget the day when the deeds and words of kindly Americans sustained and comforted her stricken warriors
on the waters of the Peiho." In fact it was generally agreed that the entente cordiale between the two nations would endure as long as the sun and moon.
But alas! how soon is all this reversed.
In a day or two after the news arrived of General Harney's occupation of San Juan, the island in the vicinity of Vancouver which John Bull covets
and claims as his own, but which clearly belongs to the United States. The tone of the British press is suddenly changed. The news from China is ignored, and ecstatic editorials on the subject are forgotten. No term to be found in Jonson's dictionary is hard enough to be applied to General Harney and the American people generally. "Pirates" and "licensed ruffians of the American army," are the mild epithets used; and we are actually threatened with an immediate British war if the act of General Harney is not speedily disavowed by our government; and the island evacuated.

Perhaps it would be better for John Bull to finish off the Chinese war before he gets an American war on his hands. We are not at all alarmed at the menaces of the English press.—
It may bluster and fume, but the last thing the British government will dream of is to enter upon a 3d American war. The finale of the second one,
the battle of New Orleans, is about as vivid in their remembrance as the battle of Taku, in which John Chinaman
so profited by the example of Andrew Jackson. The Mississippi and the Peiho are rivers of ill omen to British prestige and British pride. The English braves found fatal elbows in both, and if they try again they may find more. But before they can get the sympathies of American youth
they must learn to conduct themselves better. Respectable and civilized nations are as much disgusted with the rowdism of John Bull, who tries to bully and plunder every people on the face of the earth, as are our merchants and men of mark and intellect with the performances of the shoulder-bitters of Tammany Hall at our political conventions.

If, in addition to assisting cousin Bull in his first unfortunate battle with the Chinese, we were to surrender to him San Juan and give him free scope in Central America, and yield up to him everything else on which he might set his heart, besides letting him fire
for his amusement into our ships, on the coast of Africa or elsewhere, as it appears by telegraphic despatch the Pluto has done in the bark Hazard,
just arrived at Boston, he would then put us on the back and say we were the finest nation on earth next to himself. But seeing that we hesitate to do all this, generous Bull not only considers us very unreasonable, but a nation of "pirates" who "must be taught a lesson." The British press calculates largely on the forbearance of this country, when it knows that without striking a blow or firing a shot, but simply by refusing to sell

England our cotton, we could ruin
her staple manufactures in six months,
and create a national beggary and bankruptcy, and a revolution which would sweep her aristocracy off the face of the earth. We have nothing to fear by a collision; on the contrary, it would be easy to show that it would do us good. John Bull has everything to loose and nothing to gain by war, or threats of war, against the American people.—N. Y. Herald.

Washington's First Love.

A correspondent of the "Century," in giving some reminiscences of the old country seat called "The Cottage," in Hanover county, Virginia, relates the following account of Gen. Washington's proposal for the hand of Mary Cary, and his rejection by her father:

"Her father was Wilson Cary, Esq., of 'Celeys,' in the county of Elizabeth city, descended from the noble family of Hundson, in England.—
His relative, Colonel Archibald Cary, of Amphibith, in Chesterfield, was, at his death, the heir apparent to the Earldom. The worthy old gentleman seems, from all we know of him,
to have been as proud as the Coucy's
or the Somersets, and to have thought his family the noblest in the land.—
He lived in great state, with chariot
and horses, plate and velvet and embroidery—a worthy of the school, fully satisfied with the 'order of things,'
and enjoying serenely the good gifts of Providence. His beautiful daughter was a great heiress, and had many suitors. The one here alluded to was a young man of very high character,
a relative of George William Fairfax, Esq., who lived in Belvoir, on the Potomac, and here he met with Miss Cary, who came to visit Mrs.
Fairfax, her eldest sister. He at once proceeded to fall in love, which he did with an ardor characteristic of his nature.

"When Miss Cary went back home to 'Celeys,' on James river, he followed her like a courageous gullant, and laid open siege to the fair fortress.— In the good old times, however, something more was necessary than the consent of the young lady, and so the young dandy asked a private interview with the old lord of the manor, who listened to him throughout. When the lover had finished, Mr. Cary rose, made a low bow, and said that if this was young Mr. Washington's errand at 'Celeys,' his visit had better terminate—his daughter had been accustomed to ride in her own chariot.—
And with this allusion to the poor condition of the younger son, the interview terminated. Young Washington bowed and turned away, and in due time married the young widow, Martha Dandridge Custis, who resembled Miss Cary," says an authority, "as much as one sister ever did another.

"The old tradition does not end here. Many years fled away—Mary Cary was Mrs. Ambler, and her discarded suitor was the man who had just received the sword of Cornwallis at Yorktown, whom the whole civilized world hailed as the greatest among the great—the foremost man, not only in America, but of 'all the world.' He passed through the old metropolis, Williamsburg at the head of his victorious troops, and the people were almost crazy with joy and adoration. The vast multitude nearly prevented his horse from proceeding; the calm statue on horseback passed on serenely. All at once he perceived at a window, or in the crowd,
his old love, Mary Cary. He raised his sword and saluted her profoundly.
She fainted.

"But it does not seem that the lovely woman was to blame. She had not been able to return the affection of the youth—that was all. She married him who won her heart, Edward Ambler. He was not unworthy of this noble lady in rank or character.
He was descended through his mother
from the Huguenot house of la Roche Jaqueline, in Vendee, and inherited the honest instincts of his race. At twelve years of age he had been sent for his education to England. He graduated at Cambridge, and then made the grand tour of Europe, returning to Virginia when he was twenty-one. He was married to Miss Cary soon afterward; became collector of York; and was so much respected that when Lord Botetourt came to Virginia as Governor he brought a letter of introduction to the collector.
He died at thirty-five; and the Revolu-

What a Lady Thinks of Hairy Faces.

A disgusted female at Xenia, Ohio,
is making a terrific crusade against hairy-faced men. Hear the lady:

What expression of kindness and mild humanity can be observed in a face covered with hair from the nose down? Not any. As well might a poor rat look in the grizzly muzzle of a Scotch terrier for mercy, when about to be caught in his crushing jaws, as to look for an expression of human kindness and sympathy in the face of a hirsute man.

Who can appreciate the value of a smile? It lightens up the countenance with adorning sweetness, indicates a kind heart, and radiates gladness to the hearts of others, encourages
the desponding, soothes the afflicted,
cheers the sorrowing, disarms wrath,
and kindles up genial sympathy and reciprocal regard.

But a smile can not crop out from the face of a man "bearded" and mustached "like the pard." You suppose, from the agitation of tall grass, that some animal was crawling through it.
So you may infer, from the whisking
of hair, that a smile was burrowing
along there somewhere, out of sight.
The smile of such a man can not be distinguished from the grin of a ribbed-nosed baboon, which had burnt its mouth with a hot chestnut.

The lips are capable of indicating
a variety of passions and emotion.
They can express kindness, good humor, sweetness of disposition, sorrow, firmness, and decision of character, or they may manifest scorn, contempt, disdain, loathing, anger, and threaten like loaded revolvers. The chief expression of the best traits in Napoleon's nature were in his mouth and chin, which he could clothe with so much sweet, winning, mute, persuasive eloquence as to render his look irresistible. But when lip and chin are covered with hair you might as well look for expression in the hole of a bank swallow in the side of a gully, overhung with a tuft of grass.

The passions and affections have their poles in the face, firmness in the upper lip, mirthfulness near the outer corners of the mouth, and the affections in the edges of the lips, &c., hence, the philosophy and delight of kissing; the more intense the passion,
the more soul-thrilling and enraptur-ing the kiss. Behold that lovely woman, with a form shaped by the hand of harmony, regular features
under clustering ringlets, bright eyes beaming with intelligence, well-arranged pearly teeth, a soft and delicate skin, a mouth like Cupid's bow, a neck like ivory, a breast like alabaster, and the swelling undulations of love like snow, her lips like two rose-buds moist with morning dew,
and her cheeks,

"When the live crimson through the native white,
Shooting o'er the face, diffuses bloom
And every nameless grace."
Radiant in the beauty, she is surrounded by an atmosphere of love, as a rose exhales fragrance. Just think of one of these hairy face fellows attempting to kiss her—see him pulling up his chevaux-de-frese of bris-les to reveal his wild, beast-looking, cavernous slit of a mouth. Bah! his abominable—the idea is disgusting
—nauseous—get out—scat!
"Give us an ounce of civet, good apothecary, to sweeten my imagination."

REASON WHY THE JUDGE DIDN'T GET A "BITE."—Judge Bibb had been fishing all the morning without a nibble, having a live frog for a bait. A friend came along and said:

"Judge, let me catch a fresh bait for
you. I see a frog on the bank close beside you.

"Thank you, sir; I wish you would catch that frog, sir. It's been staring me in the face all the morning. I believe it knows that I have one of its family on my hook. Ha! ha! ha!— Catch it sir; by all means, catch it."

Mr. D— sharpened his rod and cautiously striking with the sharp end, pinned the frog through one of its hinder legs. Just then, as Mr. D—was lifting aloft his prize, the Judge began winding up his reel, and uttered in a joyous cry: "Hold still, sir! keep quiet! I've got a bite!"

"Rapidly wound the reel, rapidly came in the slackening line, till the last few yards of it floated upon the surface of the stream; and then, with a face that boded thunder, the Judge turned to Mr. D—: "Why, sir, you've caught my frog!"

And so it was. The frog, with the impulse of all amphibious animals
when wounded, had made for the shore; and there it had crouched, for four hours, directly under the Judge's nose, and holding his hook out of water.

A recent paper, published by order of the House of Commons, gives some interesting particulars respecting the national debt of Great Britain. It covers the whole period of this institution—for such it seems to be—from 1693 to the present time. The two extremes present these figures: In 1694, the year after the debt originated, the funded debt was £1,200,000,
and in 1858-'59 the funded debt of Great Britain and Ireland amounted to £786,801,154. The interest on the former was £413,407, and on the latter £27,743,215. The unfunded debt at the former period was about five and a half millions sterling, and is at present somewhat over eighteen and a quarter millions. In round numbers, therefore, the present national debt of Great Britain is £805,- 000,000, or $4,025,000,000, paying over 135,000,000 interest. Great as this debt is, it has been larger. At the close of the Napoleonic war in 1815 it reached the almost incomprehensible sum of £860,000,000.

The history of the British national debt is substantially the history of British wars. The Times, in speaking of the accumulation of the debt, truly says: "There is war, and it immediately stirs; there is peace, and it stops;
there is war, and it goes on again." Thus,
the first war with France, after the beginning of the debt, added twenty thousand pounds; and the war with Spain, at the beginning of the last century, put on twenty thousand pounds more. The American war found the debt at £130,000,000 and left it at £240,000,000—so much money thrown away. All these additions were trifles compared with that which accrued from the wars with France at the close of the last and the beginning of the present centuries, and which nearly quadrupled the last mentioned figures. But, say the British writers, if the country surmounted and reduced the enormous debt of 1815, when manufactures and commerce were in their infancy, the present aspect of the matter, of course, affords no ground of apprehension, but rather of confidence and encouragement.

How TO PASS A COUNTERFEIT
NOTE.—"I say Tom, here's a pretty good counterfeit three. If you will pass it, I will divide."

"Let's see the plaster," said Tom,
and after examining it carefully, put
it into his vest pocket, remarking:
"It's an equal division, a dollar and a half apiece."

"Yes," said Ben.
"All right," said Tom, and off he went.

A few moments afterward he quietly stepped into the store of his friend Ben, purchased a can of oysters for one dollar and a half, laying down the three dollar note for them.

The clerk looked at the note rather doubtingly, when his suspicions
were immediately calmed by Tom,
who said, "there's no use looking, for he had received that note from Ben himself not ten minutes since."

Of course the clerk, with the assurance, immediately forked over the dollar and a half in change, and with this deposit and the can of oys-
he met Ben, who asked him "if he had passed the note?" "O, yes," said Tom, "here's your share," at the same time passing over the dollar and a half to Ben.

That evening, when Ben made up his cash account, he was surprised to find the same old counterfeit three dollar note in the drawer. Turning to his "locum tenens," he asked:

"Where did you get this cursed note? Didn't you know it was a counterfeit?"

"Why," said the clerk, "Tom gave it to me, and I suspected it was fishy, but he said he had just received it from you, and I took it."

The whole thing had penetrated
the wool of Ben. With a peculiar grin, he muttered "sold," and charged the can of oysters to profit and loss account.

THE WAY TO MAKE RESTORATION.
—"Patrick, the widow Malony tells me that you have stolen one of her finest pigs. Is that so?"

"Yes, yer honor."

"What have you done with it?"

"Killed and ate it, yer honor."

"Oh, Patrick! when you are brought face to face with the widow and her pig, on the judgment day, what account will you be able to give of yourself when the woman accuses you of the theft?"

Did you say the pig would be there,
yer riverence?"

"To be sure I did."

"Well, then, yer riverence, I'll say, Mrs. Malony, there yer pig!"

JUST MARRIED.

The top of a stage coach—going over a rough road, with hills on every side, and heavy, watery clouds rolling on their tops, a cold piercing wind blowing right in your teeth, driving a drenching rain through you—is not an agreeable sort of thing, or one calculated to render a naturally reserved and not over-amiable individual talkative, or to be talked to pleasantly. In such circumstances I once traveled a rather long journey, morose and silent; inwardly confounding things in a general way, and my barometer specially, for failing to foretell a storm. So at least I sat for the first ten miles, while the rain, pouring off my ruined hat, trickled in dark streams down my unfortunate face, making map-like figures on my erst spotless linen; when I was forced to speak to a fellow-traveller who sat next me, and who insisted on honoring me with the title of "Captain," inquired if I couldn't "throw him some sort of a line to moor his hat with?" I looked at the individual, and saw that he was a seafaring man, with a face like an oak carving, so brown and solid like, fringed with a bristling, scorched beard of a ginger color. He was evidently "in holiday rig"—black satin vest, black kid gloves, gradually washing to a purple in the rain, and hat, as usual, too small, and set far back on his head. I said I was "sorry I had not a line." "Never mind, never mind," he replied, squeezing his hat furiously on; and added, "Tell you what, Captain, I'd a sight rather be in a gale off Cape Horn, on the deck of the 'Mermaid,' than on this old tea-caddy on wheels—I would!" "No doubt," I replied—not that I was in a position to express a preference from experience—merely for shortness. But he was at me again—in what was meant for a confidential, and what would have been a subdued tone, but for the noise of the fierce wind, which necessitated something of a howl—he said, "But it's all right below!" followed by a series of winks and small laughs. "What's all right?" I inquired, rather puzzled. "It's all right in the cabin—she's there, as dry as a bread barge, and as beautiful as an angel, she is!" "Who is?" said I, as we swept round a turn in the road, and got the wind "on our star-board quarter," as Jack had it, (his name was Jack, of course.) We were now under the lee of Mr. Coachman with his huge body in six or eight great coats, and so we escaped some of the wind and rain, and could speak with more comfort. So "Who is?" said I, getting interested. "Oh!" replied Jack, "you don't know. I'm down here on a spree—getting married—came down on Saturday night—was cried in church on Sunday; and (this very confidentially) a counfounded lubber of a fellow—old sweet-heart—tried to stop the thing; you see, but 'twas no use—cut her out under his bows—got married this morning, and here I am, and she's below in the cabin! I'm going to stick to shore now, and lead a private life with her—she's a tidy girl—she is!" By this time we were at the first station—horses had to be changed. So we all got down—the inside all got out, and we soon filled the snug parlor of the hotel, every one taking something more or less hot and strong. I kept by Jack and his bride, wishing to see a little more of them.

cottage garden outside, and some few flowers inside, visible through a thick white veil like those said cottage windows; and then the light gloves, already sadly soiled, made her hands look like a pair of large sized canaries, rather ill of moul, as they fluttered here and there, with affectionate solicitude, over Jack's person—now arranging his tie, now settling down his wet hair, or propping up his drenched and limp shirt collar; he meanwhile looking foolishly delighted and blushing a good deal inside—a blush couldn't get through that tanned skin of his—but he looked as if he felt one trying it. The bride still kept her veil down, and I felt curious and a little impatient to see what sort of a face came up to Jack's notions of an angel. I didn't wish to come to a rash conclusion on the subject of her looks, as I know veils to be deceptive, especially white ones, so I waited till she was induced to "take something." When set about the operation of raising the curtain, I inwardly challenged her to do so, and show a face half as beautiful as—Stop! Where was I? Well, she showed her face, and I was disappointed; I'm compelled to say she was, to use a mild phrase, rather ugly upon the whole; and as to age, Oh! never mind; she had glossy, stiff black ringlets, as black and stiff as so many ebony rulers, and absurdly developed ear-drops, like brass candle-sticks, swinging about as she moved. "What is beauty? To him she is as beautiful as all the Venuses, and it suits his purpose to believe so quite as well as though it were the case. Long may he think so, and may they be happy, I reflected. Jack was happy then, if ever. He shook hands with every one he could lay hold on, treating everybody to everything, affording opportunities, too eagerly clutched at by some, of getting gratuitously glorious; and, while he thought of his vanquished rival, and his beautiful bride, (we'd better say,) the wind might be exultingly performing the chorus, accompanying itself, with the rain on the windows.

 None but the brave,
 None but the brave,
 None but the brave deserves the fair!"
 I saw no more of the happy pair at that time. One of the "insides" stopped at the hotel; a seat was vacant, and I, with a self-sacrificing generosity, which none but myself can duly appreciate, and which I shall ever remember with pride, waved my prior claim, and let Jack get into the "cabin" beside his dry angel for the rest of the journey.

 "Good luck!—Oh! what a change!"
 The streets are interesting on a Saturday night, a dark night, say about ten o'clock, lights streaming from grocers' butchers' bakers' cook-shop and public house doors and windows; the crowd pouring on incessantly, every individual working his or her thread in the tangled web of city life; laden housewives laboring along with big baskets, with wondering weans in tow, taking home their marketing; and minding the good man's newspaper and tobacco in passing. Sad, worn-like wives, walking anxiously, looking for their husbands, their market-baskets still empty, and nothing to fill them with till they hunt them up, and too often nothing then: Thousands tiding on thinking not of these things. Men, women and children bawling wonderful pennyworths, 'stay-laces and boot-laces,' a fabulous number 'for a ha'penny,' 'Day and Martin's best paste blacking,' 'lucifer matches,' 'best Seville oranges,' 'tastest edesches of North Breton Express Scotsman or fusses,' with now and then the stentorian voice of all but the last 'speech-crier,' rising above every other noise, as he roars to the citizens, 'Just newlie published, containing a full and particular account, it may be of a ferocious murder,' or 'cur-ool and barbarous shipwreck and loss of life,' but it fails to excite us more than the stay-lace and boot-lace announcement.

So, hearing all these things, seeing all these things, one night two months after the stage coach journey, I passed on through or with the crowd; I was keeping my eye on a couple just a little before me; there was no doubt as to their relationship; the man walked in advance of his better-half, smoking, with his hands buried, pro tempore, in his coat pockets; the woman followed her imperfect half in a trailing, slipshod fashion; she was decidedly draggle-tailed, and not in the least 'purposable-like'; she carried a basket which I'm sure contained a sheep's head and 'greens.' The husband passed a cook-shop, a fragrant gale came out at the door, took him tenderly by the nose and turned him back to look in at the window, where his wife presently joined him, and there they stood, in the blaze of light from the cook-shop window, the bride and bridegroom of the stage coach! I was amazed and horrified to see the change; especially on the bride. Dear me! was the romance rubbed off so soon, like the polish off cheap furniture, or the gilding off brass jewelry! There she was in the scarcely recognizable rainbow shawl—the bonnet was only to be guessed at; I think it was the marriage one. I don't know where the ringlets were, unless they were twisted into an abominable knot at the back of her head, keeping the bonnet resting on the ruined shawl; the horrid pendulous ear-drops were there, more brassy-like now; the gloves were not; she had the door-key in her hand, (I hope she meant to wash those hands when she got home,) and there they stood in the light of a cook-shop window, two months after marriage!

They were debating rather warmly what they would have for supper.—'Pig's feet,' (oh, horror!) and sausages were the only words I could catch—these were the rival candidates for the meal. Jack, I could gather, was using his influence in favor of the former—Mrs. Jack was strongly bent on the latter; the debate grew warmer, and ended in Jack walking sulkily off, followed by his wife in a pet, without supper at all, and this only eight weeks after marriage! Nervous and curiously inclined individuals think of that! Promising and engaging girls, look at the picture! Ladies and gentlemen, do not be offended; I don't mean that either of you respectively would marry oaken-faced sailors or ebony-ringed persons with a passion for distressingly exaggerated ear-drops; or that, if you would go a marketing on a Saturday night; or, supposing you might do so, that you would quarrel on the relative merits of pig's feet and sausages. By no means.—But you may get married, and you may find that the honeymoon is succeeded, as somebody says, by a "beeswax moon!" if you don't take care to discover that Cupid likes to live on best, what sort of house suits him, and generally, how to secure his countenance so that the fastidious boy may not fly away as soon as the newness leaves your dresses and your furniture, and leave you to quarrel on things of as vital consequences as the supper of Jack and his bride.

BARNUM ON HIS LEGS AGAIN.—The Chevalier Barnum, as all our readers know, has been rather under the financial weather during the last three or four years. But he is not like the politicians, such as Fernando Wood, and others, who, once down, have a great deal of difficulty in getting on their legs again. Barnum is up and ready for the novelty of the day. It is understood that he has freed himself from his clock debts and other incumbrances, and made a full confession of all his humbugs and sins of all sorts. He is interested in Drayton's Opera Bouffe, and will soon, in his old role of showman, make a concert tour of the entire Union.

"Women are created half devil and half angel, and the angel part soars to Heaven from the marriage altar," very truthfully remarks some wise philosopher. But he does not add that it is because, at that point, she meets the other half of her devil-nature then has no further use for the angelic.

Devils.
 There are many devils that walk this world,
 Devils great and devils small;
 Devils with tails and devils without,
 Devils who whisper, devils who shout,
 Devils who mystify, devils who teach,
 Devils who pray and devils who preach;
 But the lying devil who takes his perch
 On the higher seat in the higher church,
 And makes his religion the means and end
 For concealing his guilt and betraying his friends,
 And affect a devotion his soul abhors,
 His morality squaring by statute law,
 Is the shabbiest devil of all.

ally white ones, so I waited till she was induced to "take something."— When set about the operation of raising the curtain, I inwardly challenged her to do so, and show a face half as beautiful as—Stop! Where was I?
Well, she showed her face, and I was disappointed; I'm compelled to say she was, to use a mild phrase, rather ugly upon the whole; and as to age, Oh!
never mind; she had glossy, still black ringlets, as black and stiff as so many ebony rulers, and absurdly developed ear-drops, like brass candle-sticks, swinging about as she moved.

What is beauty? To him she is as beautiful as all the Venuses, and it suits his purpose to believe so quite as well as though it were the case. Long may he think so, and may they be happy, I reflected. Jack was happy then, if ever. He shook hands with every one he could lay hold on, treating everybody to everything, affording opportunities, too eagerly clutched at by some, of getting gratuitously glorious;
and while he thought of his vanquished rival, and his beautiful bride, (we'd better say,) the wind might be exultingly performing the chorus, accompanying itself, with the rain on the windows.

"Happy happy happy pair;
None but the brave,
None but the brave,
None but the brave deserves the fair!"
I saw no more of the happy pair at that time. One of the "insides" stopped at the hotel; a seat was vacant, and I, with a self-sacrificing generosity,
which none but myself can duly appreciate, and which I shall ever remember with pride, waved my prior claim, and let Jack get into the "cabin" beside his dry angel for the rest of the journey.

"Good facts—Olt what a change!"

The streets are interesting on a Saturday night, a dark night, say about ten o'clock, lights streaming from grocers' butchers' bakers' cook-shop
and public house doors and windows;
the crowd pouring on incessantly, every individual working his or her thread in the tangled web of city life;
laden housewives laboring along with big baskets, with wandering weans in tow, taking home their marketing, and minding the good man's newspaper and tobacco in passing. Sad, worn-like wives, walking anxiously, looking for their husbands, their market-baskets still empty, and nothing to fill them with till they hunt them up, and too often nothing then. Thousands tiding on thinking not of these things.
Men, women and children bawling wonderful pennyworths, 'stay-laces
and boot-laces,' a fabulous number
'for a ha'penny,' 'Day and Martin's best paste blacking,' 'lucifer matches,'
'best Seville oranges,' 'tastiest doeshin'
of North Breelin Express Scotsman or fusses,' with now and then the stentorian voice of all but the last
'speech-crier,' rising above every other noise, as he roars to the citizens, 'Just newly published, containing a full and particular account, it may be of, a ter-r-ocious murder,' or 'cur-rool and barbarous shipwreck and loss of life,' but it fails to excite us more than the stay-lace and boot-lace announcement.

So, hearing all these things, seeing all these things, one night two months after the stage coach journey, I passed on through or with the crowd; I was keeping my eye on a couple just a little before me; there was no doubt as to their relationship; the man walked
in advance of his better-half, smoking, with his hands buried, pro tempore, in his coat pockets; the woman followed her imperfect half in a trailing, slip shod fashion; she was decidedly draggole tailed, and not in the least 'purposo like;' she carried a basket which I'm sure contained a sheep's head and 'greens.' The husband passed a cook-shop, a fragrant gale came out at the door, took him tenderly by the nose and turned him back to look in at the window, where his wife presently joined him, and there they stood, in the blaze of light from the cook-shop window, the bride and bridegroom of the stage coach! I was amazed and horrified to see the change; especially on the bride. Dear me! was the romance rubbed off so soon, like the polish off

cheap furniture, or the gilding off brass jewelry! There she was in the scarcely recognizable rainbow shawl—
the bonnet was only to be guessed at;
I think it was the marriage one. I don't know where the ringlets were,
unless they were twisted into an abominable knot at the back of her head, keeping the bonnet resting on the ruined shawl; the horrid pendulous ear-drops were there, more brassylike now; the gloves were not; she had the door-key in her hand, (I hope she meant to wash those hands when she got home,) and there they stood in the light of a cook-shop window,
two months after marriage!

They were debating rather warmly
what they would have for supper—
'Pig's feet,' (oh, horror!) and sausages were the only words I could catch
—these were the rival candidates for the meal. Jack, I could gather, was using his influence in favor of the former—Mrs. Jack was strongly bent on the latter; the debate grew warmer,
and ended in Jack walking sulkily off,
followed by his wife in a pet, without supper at all, and thus only eight weeks after marriage! Nervous and curiously inclined individuals think of that! Promising and engaging girls, look at the picture! Ladies and gentlemen, do not be offended; I don't mean that either of you respectively would marry oaken-faced sailors or ebony-ringed persons with a passion for distressingly exaggerated eardrops; or that, if you would go a marketing on a Saturday night; or, supposing you might do so, that you would quarrel on the relative merits of pig's feet and sausages. By no means—But you may get married, and you may find that the honeymoon is succeeded, as somebody says, by a "beeswax moon!" if you don't take care to discover that Cupid likes to live on best, what sort of house suits him, and generally, how to secure his countenance so that the fastidious boy may not fly away as soon as the newness leaves your dresses and your furniture, and leave you to quarrel on things of as vital consequences as the supper of Jack and his bride.

BARNUM ON HIS LEOS AGAIN.

The Chevalier Barnum, as all our readers know, has been rather under the financial weather during the last three or four years. But he is not like the politicians, such as Fernando
Wood, and others, who, once down, have a great deal of difficulty in getting on their legs again. Barnum is up and ready for the novelty of the day. It is understood that he has freed himself from his clock debts and other incumbrances, and made a full confession of all his humbugs and sins of all sorts. He is interested in Drayton's Opera Bouffo, and will soon, in his old role of showman, make a concert tour of the entire Union.

A married man says that when he first married—he had been in the happy state of matrimony just six months—he loved his wife to such a degree that he thought he could eat her up, and now he was d—d sorry
he didn't.

There are three roads out of a bad scrape—to fight out, to back out, and to keep out; but the last is the best.

An elderly spinster wrote to a friend: "A widower with ten children has proposed, and I have accepted. This is the number I should have been entitled to if I had married at the proper time."

A machine for the manufacture of ice is now in operation in London, which turns out three tons of that commodity daily. It is the invention of Mr. Harris of Australia. The oration of ether in a vacuum.

Plant trees, cultivate flowers, make the earth beautiful and fragrant—the "Women are created half devil and half angel, and the angel part scars

to Heaven from the marriage altar,"
very truthfully remarks some wise philosopher. But he does not add that it is because, at that point, she meets the other half of her devil-nature then has no further use for the angelic.

Devils.

There are many devils that walk this world,
Devils great and devils small;
Devils with tails and devils without,
Devils who whisper, devils who shout,
Devils who mystify, devils who teach,
Devils who pray and devils who preach;
But the lying devil who takes his perch
On the higher seat in the higher church,
And makes his religion the means and ends
For concealing his guilt and betraying
his friends,
And affect a devotion his soul abhors,
His morality squaring by statute laws,
Is the shabbiest devil of all.

What would Happen.

My dear Monsieur Blondin, suppose you should slip,
And you, when descending; should fall in your grip.
Pray tell me, old Gaul, what would happen to you?
Eh! Bien my dear sir, at least would be true,
You're now a Yankee and a Canadian fall,
With mine, Sir, a French one, and that would be all.

The Way of the World.

Some years ago, when I was young, and filled with hope and pride and folly, its sorrow came, and o'er me hung its gloomy pall of melancholy, I had a friend of just my years; I loved him with a deep devotion; His griefs and joys, his hopes and fears, Produced in me a like emotion.

Jailed for years to win a name, Through sleepless nights and days of trouble,

To learn this truth at last, that Fame Is but an empty, air-blown bubble. My friend sought wealth, and often wrote That he was rich and loved me dearly; And always closed his friendly note With, "Yours most truly and sincerely."

And once he wrote: "My dear old Chum, If you are short—now, don't be silly—Just drop a line, and name the sum To me, your friend and crony, Willie." But still, I have a foolish pride To keep from him my little pinches; We like, it possible, to hide Our wants from one who never flinches.

And thus I labored late and long, Until my hopes and nerves were shattered, Until my health, which never strong, Gave out, and then my friends soon scattered; For they had learned that I was poor: Now penury is not disgraceful; But to the rich, it shuts the door, And makes its victim seem distasteful.

And now, I thought, since health has flown, My ancient, wealthy friend will aid me. A small amount, a trifling loan From one so true, will not degrade me. For still he wrote, that better yet He loved me than a blood relation; He talked about his "lucky star," His wife and means, his wealth and station.

Then with a faltering pen, one day, (I had not nerve to do it boldly,) I wrote: "I have my rent to pay," Nor dreamed that he would take it coldly.

I waited long; I watched the mail; Till all my clothes were growing seedy; It came at last: I read (in jail) "See nearer friends just twice as needy."

Thus ended one of boyhood's dreams, As many a dream before has ended: Friendship is rarely what it seems— With money often closely blended. I left my books and earned my bread By earnest, patient, healthy labor, And slept serenely in my bed, Nor owe a dime to friend or neighbor. The moral here is easy shown, If they who read will only heed it: To test a friend, just ask a loan Of money when you really need it. Another lesson may be learned, Unaided by the light of science; That gold and fame are only earned By patient toil and self-reliance. [Knickerbocker.]

The La Mountain Balloon Voyage.

Narrative of Mr. Haddock, a Companion of the Trip.

The public has already been informed of the safe arrival at Ottawa, in Canada, on the 3rd instant, of Mr. La Mountain and Mr. Haddock, who ascended in the balloon Atlantic, from Watertown, New York, on the 22d of September, and for whose safety much fear was felt. The Watertown Courier of October 6th contains a long report of the voyage of the Atlantic and the wanderings and sufferings of the balloonists. The account, written by Mr. Haddock, is interesting. The balloonists were up in the air from four to five hours, when, finding themselves over a dense wilderness and the darkness of night around them, they concluded to descend. They did so, and passed the night in the balloon fastened to the top of a tall spruce tree and exposed to a drenching rain. After daylight they prepared for another ascension. But here we leave Mr. Haddock to speak for himself:

"After a night spent in great discomfort we were glad to see the first faint ray of daylight. Cold and wet and rainy the morning broke, the typical precursor, we were to learn, of other mornings to be spent in these uninhabited wilds. We waited until six o'clock in hopes the rain would cease, and that the rays of the sun, by warming the gas in the balloon, would give us ascending power sufficient to get up again, for the purpose, if no other, of obtaining a view of the country into which we had descended. The rain did not cease, and we concluded to throw over all we had in the balloon except a coat, a piece, the life-preservers, the anchor, and the compass. Overboard then they went—good shawls and blankets, Mr. Fayle's overcoat, bottles of ale and a flask of cordial, ropes and traps of all kinds.

"The Atlantic, relieved of her wet load, rose majestically with us, and we were able to behold the country below. It was an unbroken wilderness of lakes, and spruce—and we felt then that we had gone too far, through a miscalculation of the velocity of the balloon.

"As the current was driving us still to the north, we dare not stay up, as we were drifting further and still further to that 'frozen tide,' from which we knew there was no escape. Mr. La Mountain seized the valve cord and discharged the gas, and we descended in safety by the side of a large spruce. We made the Atlantic fast by her anchor and for a moment talked over what we should do. We had not a mouthful to eat; no protection at night from the damp ground, were distant we know not how far from habitation, were hungry to start with, no earthly hope of raising a fire, and no distant idea as to where we were.

"We settled in our minds that we were in John Brown's tract or in the great Canada wilderness—to the south, we thought, of Ottawa, and knew that a course south by east would take us out if we had strength enough to travel the distance. La Mountain stepped up to the balloon and gave the edge of the basket a parting shake, saying, 'Good bye, old Atlantic,' and I fancied I could see a tear in his honest eye when he said it.

"To the southeast, then, we started. After traveling about a mile and a half we came to the bank of a small creek, flowing down from the westward. At this point we were agreeably surprised to find that some human being had been there before us; for we found several small trees cut down, the coals from an old fire, and a half barrel which had contained pork. I eagerly examined the stamp. It read, 'Mess Pork, P. M., Montreal.' This settled the question that we were in Canada; for I very well knew that no Montreal inspection of pork ever found its way into the interior of New York State. We traveled all day Friday up the unknown creek, which kept its general course to the south of west, crossing it about noon on a floating log, and striking on its southern bank a 'blazed' track, which led us up to a deserted timber road, lying on the opposite side from a large lumbering shanty. We hoped one of the lumber roads might take us out to a settlement, but after traveling up them all until they terminated in the wilderness, we concluded to cross the creek to the shanty and stay in it all night. La Mountain got across safely, but my weight was greater than his, and the raft let me into the stream. I sank in all over and swam out, though it required all my strength to do so; and on reaching the bank I found myself so chilled as scarcely to be able to stand. I took off my clothes, wrung them, and we proceeded to the shanty, where we found plenty of refuse straw, but it was dry, and under a pile of it we crawled, pulling it over our heads and faces, in the hope that our breath might aid in warming our chilled bodies. I think the most revengeful, stoney heart would have pitied our condition then.

"The weary hours of night at last wore away, and we held a new council. It was evident, we reasoned, that the creek we were upon was used for 'driving' logs in the spring season. If, then, we followed it to its confluence with the Ottawa, or some stream which empties into the Ottawa, we could in time get out the same way the timber went out. The roof of the shanty was covered with the halves of logs, scooped out in a manner familiar to all woodmen. These were light and dry, and would form an excellent raft. Why not, a time before they would stick on some stone which the low water left above the surface, and then you must pry it over in some way and pass it along to the next obstruction. We were obliged to get into the stream, often up to the middle, and there I several times fell headlong, completely using up our compass, which now frantically pointed in any direction its added head thought desirable. The water had unglued the case, and it was ruined. After long hours of such labor we got the raft down, and La Mountain again tied it together. Passing on in about an hour we came to a large lake—ten miles long and six miles broad. Around it we must of course pass until we should find the outlet. So we turned up to the right, and pressed on with as much resolution as could be expected. To-day we found one clam, which I insisted La Mountain should eat, as he was weaker than myself, and had eat little or nothing on the day we went up. Around we went it, all the indentations of the shore, keeping always in shallow water. At last we stopped at a place we thought least exposed to the wind. We laid down upon the cold ground, having lifted up the end of our raft so that the wind might not drift it away in the night. We were cold when we laid down, and both of us trembled by the hour, like men suffering from a severe attack of the ague. The wind had risen just at night, and the dismal surging of the waves upon this shore formed, I thought, a fitting lullaby to slumber so disturbed and dismal as ours.

"By this time our clothes were nearly torn off. My pantaloons were slit up both legs, and the waistband nearly torn off. My boots both leaked, and our mighty wrestlings in the canon had torn the skin from ankles and hands. La Mountain's hat was gone the first day out; he had thrown away his woollen drawers and stockings the first day of our voyage. By the weight of water they absorbed, we slept but little. It really seemed as though, during that night, we passed through the horrors of a dozen deaths. "At daylight we got up by degrees, first on one knee and then on the other, so stiff and weak that we could hardly stand. Again upon the almost endless lake we went, following round its shore for an outlet. About ten o'clock we found a broad northern stream which we thought was the outlet we were seeking, and we entered it with great joy, believing it would take us to our long-sought Ottawa. Shortly after entering the stream it widened out and assumed the form of a lake. We poled up the westerly shore for about seven miles, but found we were again deceived.

"It had now been four full days since we ate a meal. All we had ate in the mean time was a frog, a piece, four clams, and a few wild berries, whose acid properties and bitter taste had probably done us more harm than good. Our strength was beginning to fail very fast, and our systems were evidently about to undergo an extraordinary change. I did not permit myself to think of food—the thought of a well covered table would have been too much. I thought over all poor Strain's sufferings on the Isthmus of Darien, where he, too, was paddling a raft down an unknown stream; but never believed we could stand half the amount of suffering he did. Besides, he had the means to make a fire; we had none. He was upon a stream which he knew would lead to the sea and safety; we were upon waters whose flow we knew really nothing of, and were as much lost as though in the mountains of the moon. "But we could not give it up so, and our fresh courage as troubles appeared to thicken. We turned the raft around, and poled her back toward the place where we had entered this last lake. We had gone about a mile when we heard the sound of a gun, quickly followed by a second report. No sound was ever so sweet to me as that. We halloed aloud as we could a good many times, but could get no response. We kept our poles going, and had gone about a half a mile, when I called La Mountain's attention to what I thought was a smoke curling up among the trees on the side of a hill.

"We went back, and after examining the stream attentively, concluded to try to get the raft down. We at once commenced, and I freely confess this the most trying and laborious work of a life of labor. The pieces would not float more than a red at

My own eyesight had begun to fail me to an extent that I could not depend upon it when a long steady gaze was necessary. He said it was smoke, and that he thought just below it, on the bank, was a bark canoe. In a few moments the blue smoke rolled gently but unmistakably above the tree tops, and we felt that we were saved. Such a revulsion of feeling was almost too much for us. We could hardly believe our own senses, and credited anything favorable to our condition with the utmost caution. Our bitter disappointments had taught us that lesson.

"We paddled the raft with the ends of our poles directly across the lake, near perhaps three-fourths of a mile wide, and made for the canoe. It proved to be a large one, evidently an Indian's. Up to the bank I pressed, leaving La Mountain at the canoe to cut off a retreat by the Indian in case he was timid, and wished to avoid us. I came at once upon the shanties of a lumbering wood, and from the chimney of the furthest building a broad volume of smoke was rising. I halloed; a noise was heard inside, and a noble-looking Indian came to the door. 'Vous parlez francais,' was my inquiry, as I grasped his outstretched hand. Yes, sir, and English too. He drew me into the cabin, and there was the head of the party, a noble-hearted Scotchman, named Angus Cameron. I immediately told my story—that we came in with a balloon, were lost and had been four days without food—asking where we were. Imagining my surprise when he said that we were one hundred and fifty miles due north of Ottawa, in the dense, uninhabited forest, whose only limit was the Arctic circle. In a word, we were nearly three hundred and ninety miles in a due north course from Watertown, in latitude 47.

"Dinner was all ready. The party consisted of four persons—Mr. Cameron, a half breed, and his son Deuceil. I dispatched the young Indian after La Mountain, who came in after a moment the absolute picture of wretchedness. All that the cabin contained was tendered us, and we began to eat. Language is inadequate to express our sensation while doing so. The clouds had all lifted from our sombre future, and the 'silver lining' shone all the brighter for the deep darkness through which we had passed.

"Here let me state that the stream we came down so far with our raft is called Fillman's Creek; the large lake we sailed around is called Bosketong Lake, and drains into Bosketong river—which flows into the Gatineau. The Gatineau joins the Ottawa opposite Ottawa City. Mr. Cameron assured us that these streams are so tortuous, and in many places so rapid, that no set of men could get a raft down, no matter how well they knew the country, nor how much provisions they might have. He regarded our deliverance as purely providential, and many times remarked that we would certainly have perished but for seeing his smoke."

Commerce with Japan.

The following is the concluding portion of an able and interesting paper read by Mr. Laurence Oliphant, on Japan, in the Geographical Section of the British Association at Aberdeen, on the 16th of September:

"From the little we know of the internal resources of Japan, it is probable that we should find a more profitable source of trade in its mineral than its vegetable productions. Unless we have been totally misinformed these former are of vast extent and great value. We know that the principle profits of the early Portuguese settlers were derived from the export of gold and silver. So lucrative was it that Knipfles remarks: 'It is believed that, had the Portuguese enjoyed the trade of Japan but twenty years longer, upon the same footing as they did for some time, such riches would have been transported out of this Ophi to Macao, and there would have been such a plenty and flow of gold and silver in that town as sacred writ mentions there was at Jerusalem in the times of Solomon.' At a later period the Dutch carried on this traffic to so great an extent that a native political economist, writing in 1708 on the subject, computes the annual exportation of gold at about 150,000 cobs, so that in ten years the empire was drained of 1,500,000 cobs, or about two millions and a half sterling. 'The gold is found in various localities. That procured from Sado has the reputation of being the finest, and is stated that the ore will yield to 2 ozs. of fine metal per mules in Gaiouga are stated rich, the copper ore raised all pregnant with gold. The Ouma yields from 4 ozs. to 6 lb. These are the principle dust is found in some of the Copper is superabundant, and from the lavash use made of mental purposes. For a long Dutch received at Nagasaki, for their merchandise, Japan. This, however, as well as gold, has been stopped for. The Government allows no to be produced now than is necessary for home consumption comparatively very small. us now to develop more full, most important elements in of this vast empire.

"By the treaty recently gold and silver coins may from Japan, but not as a exportation of copper coins, copper in bars, is prohibited. Government engages to sell, time, at public auction, quantity of copper that may be. Iron abounds in various Japan, the mines of which are worked, much more so at those of copper. Judging of casting of their own coins, ore must be of excellent quality, of wrought iron, cast steel, have been examined with very results. The wrought iron, varying from twelve to twenty each. This is probably to be a want of proper machinery bars, and its being better their purposes. The steel swords are composed, which at Yeddo, was of admirably quality. I have already the local mines which exist in Kinsui—one of them is distant miles from Nagasaki. Government monopoly. Its coal brought for sale, since of trade at Nagasaki, has coal, and consequently inferior; it is described as small slaty, leaving considerable very light. There can be that good coal is to be found land, when the mines begin to be worked. By the treaty, coal, zinc, lead, and tin are reported at a duty of five per cent."

"The vegetable production, which are most probably to come articles of commerce, are sugar, seaweed, &c. Manufactured articles we may quer ware and porcelain, but most impossible, at this season our commercial relations to their character or extent. "It would be well to remember while we have achieved result in thus opening to the prosperous and happy commerce have also incurred serious towards them, and are bound advantage of their ignorance, perience in their dealings with nations. We can only hope our civilization to them by a high moral standard, both mercantile and political intercourse are sufficiently enlightened to a policy influenced by high notions than those involved in lation of wealth. Unless we a policy, it is not too much that we shall lose alike their respect, and involve complications disastrous to commerce, and discredit to character. Of all the nations the Japanese are the most to civilizing influences; the words of an eminent Chinese scholar in saying the aspect they are far in advance of their neighbors the Chinese, attention is directed to the edge of other nations. Their efforts in this way will form security. Their soldiers, body-guard of the King of consuls once examined Spanish Acapulco; their sailors on Dutch Governor out of his bed, mossa, and carried him prisoner; rulers; their Princes once a bussy to the Pope; their Emperor defied the vengeance of Portugal, cutting her ambassadors. The edge of these historical events among them. We may reason for a great preponderance of from an extension of an which has recommended so. Let us indulge the expectation of the rising sun may be fitted for taking her place, tions, but also among Christians and with all the institutions, and purity of the best of those goods purchased at the East; the mixed Mormon and Gentile house did the same, while only two out of the ten Mormon merchants who obtained their goods on credit, have paid the full amount of their indebtedness, without in some way compromising with their creditors, and com-pounding their debts. One or two of the number paid the principal of their debts, leaving their creditors the loss of several years interest justly due upon them.—Others have paid a bare moiety of their indebtedness, while the larger portion of them have paid nothing at all, or an amount so trifling, as to bear scarcely any proportion to the sums which they justly owed. The only two men out of the ten different establishments who paid up fairly and squarely all that they owed, were Mr. Wm. Nixon, and Thomas S. Williams Esq., and it gives us pleasure to record the fact concerning them. It is indeed refreshing to meet with such instances of punctuality in the midst of such general defection. These gentlemen have the rare merit of being faithful among the faithless. But of Mr. Williams it must be said, that, although he paid the full amount of his personal liabilities, contracted while engaged in trade by him-self, he afterwards formed an unfortu-nate business alliance with a member of the Mormon church, and the paper of this firm like that of nearly all the houses in which Mormons were concerned, suffered a depreciation, and was at length parted with at a discount, though before this was done, Mr. Williams parted with his interest in the concern at a nominal rate, and his partner assumed the pay-ment of the debts owing by the firm.

We could, if our space permitted, and we thought it necessary, add some inter-esting facts in regard to the manner in which some of these Mormon "adven-turers and traders" closed their con-cerns, and the means adopted by them in conjunction with certain high dignitaries of the Mormon church to chisel their creditors out of the sums which they justly owed; but we forbear at present, believing that we have said enough to close the mouths of those who are in the habit of prating about gentle merchants, and predicting their downfall. If the columns of the Mormon journals here were sometimes employed in urging their own delinquent "adventurers and traders" to pay their honest debts, they would perform a more useful service to justice, than in fabricating statements about the deficiencies of others, and their who know them know that they are innocent of.

One word more in regard to the decline of trade, and the gloomy prospects ahead for the merchants here, and we will dis-miss this subject for the present. It is not always proof because a restaurant closes, or men change their boarding houses, that it is owing to a decline or want of success in trade. Other causes sometimes produce such changes. And though the trade here is not so brisk, nor profits so high as they were last year, still nearly, if not all the merchants of this city are doing a fair business, and at remunerative rates.

An advertisement from Jones, Russell & Co., appears in our paper this week, offering a reward of five hundred dollars for the capture of the thieves who stole a lot of mules and horses from the mail station on Weber, on the 23d of October last. It is believed that these mules were stolen and driven off with a large lot of other stolen horses and mules, by a party headed by a notorious character who spent last winter and most of the past summer, at Fairfield, near Camp Floyd, and who was known there by the name of Johnson, but whose real name is said by those who knew him to be ASHMORE.—He is said to have fled from California on account of some crime committed there, and to have changed his name in order to elude pursuit. He was last winter dismissed from Camp and denied admit-tance there, on account of some misde-meanor or violation of the army regula-tions. He more recently incited a young man or boy known as "Jack" in his em-ploy, to kill another man in Fairfield, and after the arrest of the boy for the act, to rescue him from the guard who had him in charge, by entering a room where they were late at night, with a drawn pistol in his hand, which he threat-ened to fire, if resistance was offered to the escape of the boy. His latest crime that we have heard of, is the or-ganization of a band of horse thieves, and the stealing and departure of the gang with a large drove of horses and mules on the Southern road towards Cal-ifornia. It is said that the band are being pursued by an experienced party of mountaineers, and the probability is that they will be arrested and brought back. We certainly hope that this will be the case, for Ashmore, or Johnson as he is called, is too precious a scoundrel, and has too much booty with him to get off clear. Let the people of Southern Cal-ifornia look out for the appearance of the gang among them, in case they should escape from their pursuers here.

NO MAIL.

The Eastern mail due, and expected here on yesterday, did not arrive. The stage came in but brought no mail. A letter written by one of the contractors, and brought by the party who came with the stage, states that some change in the schedule time of the departure of the the mail, was the cause of no mail being sent by the present stage. No blame is therefore attached to the contractors for the failure. We have generally observed that these changes of time in the arrival and departure of the mails, result in our getting fewer mails than we would if no changes were made, and this accend-ingly economical administration have done little else for some time past but make changes. The mail facilities of this region are few enough in all con-science since the curtailment of the mail service from a weekly to a semi-monthly mail, without having the slender privi-leges still further abridged.

THE WEATHER.—The weather for the past week has been about as disagree-able here, as weather well could be; and if the elements possessed any of the per-versities and failings of humanity, we should think that each successive day was trying to excel its predecessor in all that makes weather intolerable and od-ious. Yesterday excelled any of the pre-vious days in the variety and extent of its unpleasant features: it was, cold, drizzling, blowing and snowing through-out almost the entire day, and when to all these we add the slish and mud that covered the streets and sidewalks, some conception, perhaps can be formed by those who were not here to experience it, how really disagreeable the day was.—The whole day seemed fitted and design-ed to conjure up blue devils, and suited to hardly any other purpose.

MORE HORSE STEALING.—Notwith-standing the departure of the desperado Johnson and his gang of horse thieves, it seems that they have left behind them here many worthy followers of their example. We have been told that there is an organized band of horse thieves, extending throughout the Territory, and the frequency and extent to which the practice is carried on, would appear to

We hear almost daily of depredations of the kind being committed, sometimes on a most magnificent scale. Mr. Freder-ick Burr, we were a day or two since informed, lost in one night, from a ranche about thirty miles north of this city, twenty head of fine Flat-head hor-ses, most of them very valuable. It has been only a short time since Mr. Burr had twenty-two other horses stolen from the same ranche. His losses altogether must be very heavy, if he does not suc-ceed in recovering his stock, and this ap-pears little probable.

MR. EDITOR: As I have seen no an-swer in your paper to the article pub-lished a week or two ago in the Mountaineer, in regard to the public lands and military reserves of the Territory, I pro-pose, with your permission, to offer some thoughts on the subject. The authority of the United States to locate the pub-lic lands for the use of the military re-serves and other purposes, we believe, has never before been disputed or ques-tioned, until the late proclamation in re-gard to the reserves about Camp Floyd, Bridger and Bear river was published. This eternal croaking and harping about rights and privileges looks well coming from the mouths of people who are band-ed together for the purpose of doing all they can to destroy the power of the General Government. What rights can a people have who live in direct viola-tion of all law, both moral, human and divine, to expect from the Government? What rights can a people have who liden with eagerness, every Sunday from the pulpit, and we know not how often, to words of blasphemy and high treason, to claim a title to the lands which belong to the free-sons and daughters of the United States? At a moderate calculation three-fourths of the people in this valley are not citi-zens. They come to our hospitable shores with money furnished them by the church, and are hurried across the Plains for fear they will get some knowl-edge of the great benefits and privileges that would belong to them if they would remain in the States and become good citizens. But they have taken no oath of allegiance, and consequently have no rights, and by their conduct, have for-fetted all claim to the respect and pro-tection of the General Government. The day is close at hand, when Congress will take some decisive steps towards driving forth from her territory and domains ev-ery live representative of a people, who, under the cloak of a fanatical religion, have taken a solemn oath, administered with mystic rites and awful ceremonies, (which it would be death to divulge,) to raise the bloody standard of treason, whenever called upon to do so by their leader.

Shame on such impudence! Shame on such a people! and a deeper shame than fell on Cain, the first murderer, will be the portion of these leaders. Who is to pay the claims now held against the U. S. Government, for the millions of dollars stolen from true and lawful citizens of our country, while passing through their settlements on their way home, rich with the glittering treasure from California? Who is to raise and educate the orphans now in the States, whose parents have fallen victims to Mormon avarice and assassination? Who is to atone for that terrible tragedy, now known throughout the world as more brutal than the cele-brated massacre of Wyoming? Who is to support the mothers, wives, sisters, daughters of all the victims whose bones now whiten and bleach uncovered in ev-ery canyon throughout the country? The soil of the valley is wet with the blood of innocent men, whose orphan children are crying aloud to the Govern-ment for vengeance; and it will come! Every Senator, Congressman and Repre-sentative is now called upon, to do some-thing to put down this desperate frater-nity; and they will do it. The signs never were better. Congress meets next month; a list of crimes longer and black-er than were ever before recorded against any set of people, will be furnished them. The reports of the Marshal, the Judges, and the Judge, too, will be there. Con-gress has the right to repeal all laws that she has made; the troops are on the ground; and it will take but a few words to destroy forever the power of the "Lat-ter day Saints" in Utah.

HOW HORACE GREELEY ENTERED CALIFORNIA.

Horace Greeley, in a letter from Placerville to the New York Tribune, gives the following account of his entrance into California from Carson Valley:

From Carson Valley we rose again for two miles, along a narrow road out into the side of a mountain, with a precipitous descent on the right. Then we be-gan to descend once more, beside a rivu-let which leaped and laughed on its way to the Pacific. The ascent from the Car-son side is far shorter than the descent this way, Carson Valley being much higher than that of the Sacramento. But the road, even on this side, is, for most of the way, eaten into the side of a steep mountain, with a precipice from five to fifteen hundred feet on one side, and as steep an eminence on the other. Yet along this mere shelf, with hardly a place to each mile where two meeting wagons can pass, the mail stage was driven at the rate of ten miles an hour (in one instance eleven), or just as fast as four wild California horses, whom two men could scarcely harness, could draw it. Our driver was of course skillful; but had he met a wagon suddenly on rounding one of the sharp points or pro-jections we were constantly passing, a fearful crash was unavoidable. Had his horses seen fit to run away (as they did run once, on the unhooking of a trace, but at a place where he had room to rein them out of the road on the upper side, and thus stop them) I know that he could not have held them, and we might have pitched headlong down a precipice of a thousand feet, where all the concern that could have been picked up afterward would not have been worth two bits per bushel. Yet at this breakneck rate we were driven for not less than four hours or forty miles, changing every ten or fifteen, and raising a cloud of dust through which at all times it was exceedingly difficult to see anything. We crossed the South fork of the American river eighteen miles above this, rising two or three miles immediately after to the summit of the ridge south, and thenceforward the road, nearly to this city, descends steady-ly a beautifully inclined ridge, and, but for the dust, would be one of the finest drives on earth. And right glad was I to find myself once more among friends, surrounded by the comforts of civilization, with a prospect of occasional rest. I cannot conscientiously recommend the route I have traveled to tourists in quest of pleasure, but it is a balm for many bruises to know that I am in California.

"At the St. Lawrence Hotel, at supper, some corn was served along with other dishes, and, being offered to Wisden, he took some. But, how to eat it? Wisden looked round the table, but there was none partaking of corn, so he was left to his own inventive resources. After some meditation, and a cautious survey of the table to see if any were observing him, he took it up boldly and stuck it between his teeth endwise. Imagine his disap-pointment at finding a cob in the middle of the luscious morsel."

THE SCHOOL-HOUSE IN THE GROVE.

O, 'twas a lovely place,
That School-house in the grove,
Where first I learned to trace
The names of those I love.
The many hours which there I spent,
Are sacred to my love,
For boys and girls all went
To the School-house in the grove.

'Twas there a gentle miss,
Of blooming, sweet sixteen,
First gave to me the kiss,
The kiss of love I mean.
'Twas there my heart first yearned
For holy, truthful love;
This was the task I learned
At the School-house in the grove.

But now, long years have flown,
Since that eventful day,
The gentle miss has grown
A lady fine and gay;
But O! she loves me not,
While thus I'm forced to rove;
I fear she has forgot
The School-house in the grove.

READING.—"Nothing," says Dugald Stewart, "has such a tendency to weak-en, not only the powers of invention, but the intellectual powers in general, as a habit of extensive reading without reflec-tion."

For the proper storing of the mind, and to meet the various events of life, it is important that we should not confine our-selves to a particular class of subjects. Unwilling as we should be to counsel a multifariousness in our reading, we should equally object to an entire adherence to any one class of studies. It is not only necessary to prevent one-sidedness in our views, but likewise to the proper exer-cise and full development of our mental energies, that our range of reading should be extensive. A proper mixture of the scientific and the literary should be our aim. The course of science and litera-ture is onward. Dissatisfied with the past, we should gather as we can, the new discoveries which are continually occurring, and enrich our minds with the latest intelligence in the domain of truth.

The New York Correspondent of the Charleston Mercury says that of the filibusters, the only notable ones left among us are Wheat and Henningson.—In the general topsy-turvy of all their Nicaragua and Cuban plans, these gal-lant souls don't know what to do with themselves. They may be seen any even-ing at the St. Nicholas, where they are pointed out to strangers as curious spec-imens of a race of beings now, alas, nearly extinct.

On the 1st ult. the tomb of Charles XII. was opened in the presence of the King of Sweden, Prince Oscar, and oth-ers, by Prof. Fryxell, the Swedish histo-rian. This was done to set at rest the stories which have been afloat about the manner of his death, especially that of assassination. From an examination of the body it was determined that death was caused by a large projectile, which entered the left temple and came out through the right. As Charles was in the trenches before Fredericksburg when he fell, with his left side turned toward the enemy, this discovery must, at least, very much reduce the probabilities of as-sassination.

ST. THOMAS.—The island of St. Thom-as, reported to have been ceded to the U. States by Denmark, is small in size, be-ing no more than seventeen miles in length, and four and a half in its great-est breadth, but has a fine harbor, and has enjoyed the advantage of being a de-pot of goods for many neighboring is-lands. It is annually visited by a very large number of vessels, and has an ex-tensive trade. The population is stated at twelve to thirteen thousand.

"Mrs. Jones," said a gentleman one day last summer, when railroad accidents were so numerous, to a lady whose hus-band was a brakeman, "Mrs. Jones, do you not feel worried about Mr. Jones while he is on the cars, in view of the many accidents that are now daily oc-curring?" "We-I-I-n-o—not at all," re-plied the lady, "for, d'ye see, if he is killed I know I shall be paid for it, be-cause Mr. Williams got $40 for his cow that was run over by the cars a few days since."

"Poker" is said to have become quite a fashionable game with the Digger In-dians of North California; they are gam-bling for arrows, pieces of flint, and other small change.

A penny was deposited in the cor-ner stone of a church at Jackson, Mich., last week, that had been taken from a corner stone of a temple in Rome, built during the reign of the first Cæsar.

Daniel Webster's Confes-sion of Faith.

Dr. Smith, of this city, (Concord, N. H.) has put into our hand the following letter of Daniel Webster to Rev. Thomas Worcester, formerly pastor of the Congregational church in Salisbury, which is accom-ppanied with a confession of his reli-gious faith, both of which are in his own handwriting. We have seen Mr. Webster's name in the records of the Church in Salisbury, enrolled among its members, if we mistake not, about the time the letter below bears date. He remained a member of that church till his death. The letter and confession were never be-fore published. They are as follows:

BOSTON, Aug. 8, 1890.
DEAR SIR:—The other day we were conversing respecting con-ceptions of faith. Some time ago I wrote down, for my own use, a few propositions in the shape of articles, many of the doctrines of the Christian religion, as they impress my mind. I have taken the liberty to enclose a copy for your perusal. I am, with respect, Yours, &c., D. WEBSTER.

I believe in the existence of Almighty God, who created and governs the whole world. I am taught this by the works of nature and the word of revelation.

I believe that God exists in three persons; this I learn from revelation alone. Nor is it any objection to this belief, that I cannot comprehend how one can be three or three can be one. I hold it my duty to believe, not what I can comprehend or account for, but what my Maker teaches me.

I believe the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be the will and word of God.

I believe Jesus Christ to be the Son of God. The miracles which he wrought, establish, in my mind, his personal authority, and render it proper for me to believe whatever he asserts; I believe, therefore, all his declarations, as well when he declares himself to be the Son of God, as when he declares any other proposition. And I believe there is no other way of salvation, than through the merits of his atonement.

I believe that things past, present, and to come, are all equally pre-sent to the mind of the Deity; that him there is no succession of tho-rough ideas; that, therefore, the na-tive terms past, present, and future, as used among men, cannot with strict propriety, be applied to Deity. I believe in the doctrines of foreknow-ledge and predestination, as ex-pounded. I do not believe in the doctrines, as imposing any fatal-ity or necessity on men's actions, or as way infringing free agency.

I believe in the utter inability of any human being to work out his own salvation, without the con-sent and aid of the Spirit of all grace.

I believe in those great peculiarities of the Christian religion—a resurrex-tion from the dead, and a day of judg-ment.

I believe in the universal Provi-dence of God; and leave to Epicurus and his more unreasonable followers in modern time, the inconsistency of believing that God made a world which he does not take the trouble of govern-ing.

Although I have great respect for some other forms of worship, I believe the Congregational mode on the whole to be preferable to any other.

I believe religion to be a matter not of demonstration, but of faith.—God requires us to give credit to the truths which he reveals, not because we can prove them. When the mind is reasonably convinced that the Bible is the word of God, the only remain-ing duty is to receive its doctrines with full confidence of their truth, and practise them with a pure heart.

I believe that the Bible is to be understood and received in the plain and obvious meaning of its passages; since I cannot persuade myself that a book intended for the instruction and conversion of the whole world, should cover its true meaning in such mystery and doubt, that none but critics and philosophers can discover it.

I believe that the experiments and subtleties of human wisdom are more likely to obscure than enlighten the revealed will of God, and that he is the most accomplished Christian scholar who had been educated at the feet of Jesus, and in the College of Fishermen.

I believe that all true religion con-sists in the heart and the affections, and that, therefore, all creeds and confessions are fallible and uncer-tain evidences of evangelical piety.

Finally, I believe that Christ has imposed on all his disciples a life of active benevolence; that he who re-frains only from what he thinks to be sinful, has performed but a part, and a small part of his duty; that he is bound to do good and commu-nicate, to love his neighbor and give food and drink to his enemy, and to endeavor, as far as in him lies, to promote the peace, truth, piety and hap-piness in a wicked and forlorn world, believing that in the great day which is to come, there will be no other standard of merit, no other criterion of character, than that which is al-ready established. "By their fruits ye shall know them."—[Cong. Jour-nal.]

VALLEY TAN.

Sketches of Salt Lake Past and Present.

As referred to do not directly merchants with bankruptcy, much more artful, and as they suppose, more sure way of getting the coup de grace to the merchants than by openly Thus, intimations concerning nation of business, shelve merchandise without causing, empty tills, with urgent pressing round. These, with insinuations are used to account more direct attacks come same source, would be powerful, even if there was the man take them. The last number of Nevs, the more able and of these journals, in its leading, under the heading of "mercenary affairs," indulges in its statements and accusations, the credit of our merchants, and their standing as citizens any article we have yet in regard to them; and if we wherever the Nevs circulates is the obedient organ of the press, opposed to every thing that is opposed to that to its foul corruptions, some pents contained in the article might be of injury to the class assailed in it, for nothing is to the touch as credit, and rates more prejudicially to a than statements calculated distrust and doubts concerning his solvency or integrity. of business men have been factually and as disastrously fements, as they could have or any other means by which labor may be destroyed; and to every trading and business credit and reputation for honesty, that the law guards, the jealous care, his business and standing that it throws private reputation. This fact the Nevs should well know, a judge, by virtue of a Territory, conferring upon its powers which else only to courts of common jury jurisdiction. And if judge and editor is ignorant of the principles of law, unfit for the duties of the is aware of it, he violates in of editor the rights and sanctity of a judge, it is his duty to protect. In either case he knows nothing about, in fact untrue, and then to "report" his own groundless "If reports are true," he leader part of the adventures have gone home to obtain exit of any railroads that have been, running westward from here, nor of any mail facilities, line, but of their credit. Of this "report," we have that the greater part of the "traders" who have gone here this fall, went because of their stocks, and occasion for their remaining in the winter. Of the one bers of regular houses here the east, we presume that it difficult for any man to state, gone there to obtain an "extra credit," though possibly might come in to aid the impudence of the Editor of the Now we propose, instead of furnish the Editor of the public with some facts the relative standing of some merchants and traders" in this territory. We have been at trouble to obtain a list of to ascertain what opinions held in regard to the mode of "Mormonism," and also result to themselves, and to ora of these different mercantile concerns. Our inquiries, in the attachment of the acts:

Up to the time at which the into this Valley, more than the whole number of firms little establishments that trade Valley, and purchased goods at, amounted to thirty. Of ten firms and single traders alle," ten more were "Mormon," in was composed of both Genormon. The Gentile houses had the full indebtedness for goods purchased at the East; the mixed Mormon and Gentile houses did the same, while only two out of the ten Mormon merchants who obtained their goods on credit, have paid the full amount of their indebtedness, without in some way compromising with their creditors, and compounding their debts. One or two of the number paid the principal of their debts, leaving their creditors the loss of several years interest justly due upon them. Others have paid a bare mummy of their indebtedness, while the larger portion of them have paid nothing at all, or an amount so trifling, as to bear scarcely any proportion to the sums which they justly owed. The only two men out of the ten different establishments who paid up fairly and squarely all that they owed, were Mr. Wm. Nixon, a present a merchant of this city, and Thomas S. Williams Esq., and it gives us pleasure to record the fact concerning them. It is indeed refreshing to meet with such instances of punctuality in the midst of such general dereliction. These gentlemen have the rare merit of being faithful among the faithless. But of Mr. Williams it must be said, that, although he paid the full amount of his personal liabilities, contracted while engaged in trade by himself, he afterwards formed an unfortunate business alliance with a member of the Mormon church, and the paper of this firm like that of nearly all the houses in which Mormons were concerned, suffered a depreciation, and was at length parted with at a discount, though before this was done, Mr. Williams parted with his interest in the concern at a nominal rate, and his partner assumed the payment of the debts owing by the firm.

We could, if our space permitted, and we thought it necessary, add some interesting facts in regard to the manner in which some of these Mormon "adventurers and traders" closed their concerns, and the means adopted by them in conjunction with certain high dignitaries of the Mormon church to chisel their creditors out of the sums which they justly owed; but we forbear at present, believing that we have said enough to close the mouths of those who are in the habit of prating about gentle merchants, and predicting their downfall. If the columns of the Mormon journals here were sometimes employed in urging their own delinquent "adventurers and traders" to pay their honest debts, they would perform a more useful service to justice, than in fabricating statements about the deficiencies of others, and their own supposed rectitude, who know them know that they are innocent of.

One word more in regard to the decline of trade, and the gloomy prospects ahead for the merchants here, and we will dismiss this subject for the present. It is not always proof because a restaurant closes, or men change their boarding houses, that it is owing to a decline or want of success in trade. Other causes sometimes produce such changes. And though the trade here is not so brisk, nor profits so high as they were last year, still nearly, if not all the merchants of this city are doing a fair business, and at remunerative rates.

An advertisement from Jones, Russell & Co., appears in our paper this week, offering a reward of five hundred dollars for the capture of the thieves who stole a lot of mules and horses from the mail station on Weber, on the 23d of October last. It is believed that these mules were stolen and driven off with a large lot of other stolen horses and mules, by a party headed by a notorious character who spent last winter and most of the past summer, at Fairfield, near Camp Floyd, and who was known there by the name of Johnson, but whose real name is said by those who knew him to be Ashmore. He is said to have fled from California on account of some crime committed there, and to have changed his name in order to elude pursuit. He was last winter dismissed from Camp and denied admittance there, on account of some misdemeanor or violation of the army regulations. He more recently incited a young man or boy known as "Jack" in his employ, to kill another man in Fairfield, and after the arrest of the boy for the act, to rescue him from the guard who had him in charge, by entering a room where they were; late at night, with a drawn pistol in his hand, which he threatened to fire, if resistance was offered to the escape of the boy. His latest crime that we have heard of, is the organization of a band of horse thieves, and the stealing and departure of the gang with a large drove of horses and mules on the Southern road towards California. It is said that the band are being pursued by an experienced party of mountaineers, and the probability is that they will be arrested and brought back. We certainly hope that this will be the case, for Ashmore, or Johnson as he is called, is too precious a scoundrel, and has too much booty with him to get off clear. Let the people of Southern California look out for the appearance of the gang among them, in case they should escape from their pursuers here.

The Eastern mail due, and expected here on yesterday, did not arrive. The stage came in but brought no mail. A letter written by one of the contractors, and brought by the party who came with the stage, states that some change in the schedule time of the departure of the mail, was the cause of no mail being sent by the present stage. No blame is therefore attached to the contractors for the failure. We have generally observed that these changes of time in the arrival and departure of the mails, result in our getting fewer mails than we would if no changes were made, and this accordingly economical administration have done little else for some time past but make changes. The mail facilities of this region are few enough in all consequence since the curtailment of the mail service from a weekly to a semi-monthly mail, without having the slender privileges still further abridged.

THE WEATHER.—The weather for the past week has been about as disagreeable here, as weather well could be; and if the elements possessed any of the perversities and failings of humanity, we should think that each successive day was trying to excel its predecessor in all that makes weather intolerable and odious. Yesterday excelled any of the previous days in the variety and extent of its unpleasant features: it was cold, drizzling, blowing and snowing throughout almost the entire day, and when to all these we add the sleet and mud that covered the streets and sidewalks, some conception, perhaps can be formed by those who were not here to experience it, how really disagreeable the day was. The whole day seemed fitted and designed to conjure up blue devils, and suited to hardly any other purpose.

MORE HORSE STEALING.—Notwithstanding the departure of the desperado Johnson and his gang of horse thieves, it seems that they have left behind them many worthy followers of their example. We have been told that there is an organized band of horse thieves, extending throughout the Territory, and the frequency and extent to which the practise is carried on, would appear to establish the veracity of the report. We hear almost daily of depredations of the kind being committed, sometimes on a most magnificent scale. Mr. Frederick Burr, we were a day or two since informed, lost in one night, from a rancho about thirty miles north of this city, twenty head of fine Flat-head horses, most of them very valuable. It has been only a short time since Mr. Burr had twenty-two other horses stolen from the same rancho. His losses altogether must be very heavy, if he does not succeed in recovering his stock, and this appears little probable.

We accuse no one with the commission of these extensive thefts, but we do not believe it was done by the Indians, or the gentle merchants of this city, although they have been charged with meeting in secret conclaves to concert hellish plots. We report expect and believe that somebody was concerned in it, who is familiar with the secret passes and hiding places that surround these valleys.

MR. EDITOR: As I have seen no answer in your paper to the article published a week or two ago in the Mountain, in regard to the public lands and military reserves of the Territory, I propose, with your permission, to offer some thoughts on the subject. The authority of the United States to locate on the public lands for the use of the military reserves and other purposes, we believe, has never before been disputed or questioned, until the late proclamation in regard to the reserves about Camp Floyd, Bridger and Bear river was published. This eternal croaking and larking about rights and privileges looks well coming from the mouths of people who are banded together for the purpose of doing all they can to destroy the power of the General Government. What rights can a people have who live in direct violation of all law, both moral, human and divine, to expect from the Government? What rights can a people have who live with eagerness, every Sunday from the pulpit, and we know not how often, to feds of blasphemy and high treason, to claim a title to the lands which belong to the free sons and daughters of the United States? At a moderate calculation three-fourths of the people in this valley are hot citizens. They come to our habitable shores with money furnished them by the church, and are hurried across the plains for fear they will get on knowledge of the great benefits and privileges that would belong to them if they would remain in the States and become good citizens. But they have taken no oath of allegiance, and consequently have no rights, and by their conduct, have forfeited all claim to the respect and protection of the General Government. The day is close at hand, when Congress will take some decisive steps towards driving forth from her territory and domains every live representative of a people, who, under the cloak of a fanatical religion, have taken a solemn oath, administered with mystic rites and awful ceremonies, (which it would be death to divulge), to raise the bloody standard of treason, whenever called upon to do so by their leader.

Shame on such impudence! Shame on such a people! and a deeper shame than fell on Cain, the first murderer, will be the portion of these leaders. Who is to pay the claims now held against the U. S. Government, for the millions of dollars stolen from true and lawful citizens of our country, while passing through their settlements on their way home, rich with the glittering treasure from California? Who is to raise and educate the orphans now in the States, whose parents have fallen victims to Mormon avarice and assassination? Who is to atone for that terrible tragedy, now known throughout the world as more brutal than the celebrated massacre of Wyoming? Who is to support the mothers, wives, sisters, daughters of all the victims whose bones now whiten and bleach uncovered in every canyon throughout the country? The soil of the valley is wet with the blood of innocent men, whose orphan children are crying aloud to the Government for vengeance; and it will come! Every Senator, Congressman and Representative is now called upon to do something to put down this desperate fraternity; and they will do it. The signs never were better. Congress meets next month; a list of crimes longer and blacker than were ever before recorded against any set of people, will be furnished them. The reports of the Marshal, the Judges, and the Judge, too, will be there. Congress has the right to repeal all laws that she has made; the troops are on the ground; and it will take but a few words to destroy forever the power of the "Latter-day Saints" in Utah.

How Horace Greeley entered California.

Horace Greeley, in a letter from Placerville to the New York Tribune, gives the following particulars of his journey into California from Carson Valley:

From Carson Valley we rode again for two miles, along a narrow road cut into the side of a mountain, with a precipitous descent on the right. Then we began to descend once more, beside a rivulet which leaped and laughed on its way to the Pacific. The ascent from the Carson side is far shorter than the descent this way, Carson Valley being much higher than that of the Sacramento. But the road, even on this side, is, for most of the way, eaten into the side of a steep mountain, with a precipice from five to fifteen hundred feet on one side, and as steep an eminence on the other. Yet along this mere shelf, with hardly a place to each mile where two meeting wagons can pass, the mail stage was driven at the rate of ten miles an hour (in one instance eleven,) or just as fast as four wild California horses, whose two men could scarcely harness, could draw it. Our driver was of course skillful; but had he met a wagon suddenly on rounding one of the sharp points or projections we were constantly passing, a fearful crash was unavoidable. Had his horses seen fit to run away (as they did run once, on the unhooking of a trace, but at a place where he had room to rein them out of the road on the upper side, and thus stop them) I know that he could not have held them, and we might have pitched headlong down a precipice of a thousand feet, where all the concern that could have been picked up afterward would not have been worth two bits per barrel. Yet at this breakneck rate we were driven for not less than four hours or forty miles, changing every ten or fifteen, and raising a cloud of dust through which at all times it was exceedingly difficult to see anything. We crossed the South fork of the American river eighteen miles above this, rising two or three miles immediately after to the summit of the ridge south, and thenceforward the road, nearly to this city, descends steadily a beautifully inclined ridge, and, but for the dust, would be one of the finest drives on earth. And right glad was I to find myself once more among friends, surrounded by the comforts of civilization, with a prospect of occasional rest. I cannot conscientiously recommend the route I have traveled to tourists in quest of pleasure, but it is a balm for many bruises to know that I am in California.

I believe in the universal Promises of God; and, as to Epicurians and his more unreasonable followers in modern times, the inconsistency of believing that God made a world which he does not take the trouble of governing.

Although I have great respect for some other forms of worship, I believe the Congregational mode, on the whole to be preferable to any other.

I believe religion to be a matter not of demonstration, but of faith—God requires us to give credit to the truths which he reveals, not because we can prove them. When the mind is reasonably convinced that the Bible is the word of God, the only remaining duty is to receive its doctrines, with full confidence of their truth, and practise them with a pure heart.

I believe that the Bible is to be understood and received in the plain and obvious meaning of its passages; since I cannot persuade myself that a book intended for the instruction and conversion of the whole world, should cover its true meaning in such mystery and doubt, that none but critics and philosophers can discover it.

I believe that the experiments and subtleties of human wisdom are more likely to obscure than enlighten the revealed will of God, and that he is the most accomplished Christian scholar who had been educated at the feet of Jesus, and in the College of Fishermen.

Finally, I believe that Christ has imposed on all his disciples a life of active benevolence; that he who refrains only from what he thinks to be sinful, has performed but a part, and a small part of his duty; that he is bound to do good and communicate, to love his neighbor and give food and drink to his enemy, and to endeavor, as far as in him lies, to promote the peace, truth, piety and happiness in a wicked and forlorn world, believing that in the great day which is to come, there will be no other standard of merit, no other criterion of character, than that which is already established. 1897. Every day we are getting more and more use of the word "valley" in our articles. It is a word which has been used for centuries, and it is one of the most beautiful words in the English language. It is a word which has been used by poets and prose writers, and it is a word which has been used by the people of the valley. It is a word which has been used by the people of the valley, and it is a word which has been used by the people of the valley.

personal Character of Daniel Webster. We have already published one of the eloquent orations of Daniel Webster, delivered on the occasion of the funeral of the late President Lincoln. But the following is a more personal and intimate portrait of the man, as seen through the eyes of those who knew him best.

This is not the occasion to dwell on the personal character of Mr. Webster, on the fascinations of his intellect, or the charm of his conversation. Something I could say on his companionable disposition and habits, his genial and generous nature, his love of nature, his love of his family, his love of his country, his love of his people, his love of his God. But I will not say more than I can say of his personal character, his love of his family, his love of his country, his love of his people, his love of his God.

Some other things, my friends, which your indulgence, I would say, I have not said. On the 17th of July, 1804, a young man from New Hampshire arrived in Boston, all but penniless, and all but friendless. He was twenty-two years of age, and had come to take his first steps in the career of life at the capital of New England. Three days after arriving, he presented himself, without letters of recommendation, to Mr. Christopher Gore, who had just returned from England, and who was then in the office of the Secretary of the Navy. His only introduction was by a young man as little known as Mr. Gore as himself, and who had just pronounced his name, which he did so indistinctly as not to be heard. His slender figure, striking appearance, large dark eye and massive brow, his general appearance in a simple and modest dress, his unassuming and modest demeanour, his arrested attention and inspired confidence. His humble suit was not noticed, and he was received into the office of the Secretary of the Navy. Mr. Gore learned that his name was Daniel Webster. His older brother, older in years, but later in life—(for whose education

Daniel, while teacher at the academy at Fryeburg, had drudged till midnight in the office of Register of Deeds—at that time taught a small school in Short street, (now Kingston street,) in Boston, and while he was in attendance at the commencement of Dartmouth, in 1804, to receive his degree, Daniel supplied his place. At that school, at the age of ten, was then a pupil, and there commenced a friendship which lasted without interruption or chill, while his life lasted; of which, while mine lasts, the grateful recollection will never perish. From that time forward, I know, I honored, I loved him. I saw him at all seasons and on all occasions, in the flush of public triumph, in the intimacy of the fireside, in the most unreserved interchange of personal confidence, in health and in sickness; in sorrow and in joy; when early honors began to wreath his brow, and in after life through most of the important scenes of his public career. I saw him on occasions that show the manly strength, and what is better, the manly weakness of the human heart; and I declare this day, in the presence of heaven and of men, that I never heard from him the expression of a wish unbecoming a good citizen and a patriot, the utterance of a word unworthy a gentleman and a Christian; that I never knew a more generous spirit, a safer adviser, a warmer friend.

"Do you ask me if he had faults? I answer, he was a man. He had some of the faults of a lofty spirit, a genial temperament, and a warm and generous nature; he had none of the faults of a grovelling mean, and malignant nature. He had especially the last infirmity of a noble mind." And had no doubt raised an aspiring eye to the highest objects of political ambition. But he did it in the honest pride of a capacity equal to the station, and with a consciousness that he should reflect back the honor which it conferred. He might say with Burke, that "he had no arts but honest arts;" and if he sought the highest honors of the state, he did it by transcendent talent, laborious service and patriotic devotion to the public good.

"It was not given to him, any more than to the other members of the great triumvirate with whom his name is habitually associated, to attain the object of their ambition; but posterity will do them justice, and begins already to discharge the debt of respect and gratitude. A noble mausoleum in honor of Clay, and his statue by Hart, are in progress; the statue of Calhoun, by Powers, adorns the Court House in Charleston, and a magnificent monument to his memory is in preparation; and we present you this day, fellow citizens, the statue of Webster, in enduring bronze, on a pedestal of granite, from his native State, the noble countenance, modeled from life, at the meridian of his days and his fame, and his person produced, from faithful recollection, by the oldest and most distinguished of the living artists of this country. He sleeps by the multitudinous ocean, which he himself so much resembled, in its mighty movement and its mighty repose; but his monumental form shall henceforward stand sentry at the portals of the Capitol, the right hand pointing to the symbol of the Union on which the left reposes, and his imperial gaze directed, with the hopes of his country, to the boundless West. In a few short years we, whose eyes have rested upon his majestic person, whose years have drunk in the music of his clarion voice, shall have gone to our rest; but our children, for ages to come, as they dwell with awe-struck gaze upon the monumental bronze, shall say, O that we could have seen, O that we could have heard the great original.

"Two hundred and twenty-nine years ago, this day our beloved city received from the General Court of the Colony, the honored name of Boston. On the long roll of those whom she has welcomed to her nurturing bosom, is there a name that shines with a brighter lustre than his? Seventy-two years ago, this day, the Constitution of the United States was tendered to the acceptance of the people by George Washington. Who of all the gifted and patriotic of the land, that have adorned the interval, has done more to unfold its principles, assert its purity, and to promote its duration? Here, then, under the cope of Heaven;—here, on this lovely eminence; here, beneath the walls of the Capitol of old Massachusetts; here, within the sight of those far New England villages here, in the near vicinity of the graves of those who planted the germs of all this palmy growth; here, within the sound of sacred bells, we raise this monument, with loving hearts, to the Statesman, the Patriot, the Fellow-Citizen, the Neighbor, the Friend. Long may it guard the approach, to those halls of council; long may it look out upon a prosperous country; and if days of trial and disaster should come, add the arm of flesh should fail, doubt not that the monumental form would descend from its pedestal, to stand in the front rank of the peril, and the bronze lips repeat the cry of the living voice,—"Liberty and Union, now and forever, one and inseparable."

What the Telegraph would have saved.

What a world of trouble, annoyance, uncertainty and expense might have been saved to the Government of the United States, in connection with the San Juan Island affair, had the telegraphic wires been stretched entirely across the continent, as they should have been long since! Reflect upon the facts for a moment. Suppose the telegraph in working order from Fort Vancouver, on the Columbia, to Washington City, when Gen. Harney was apprised of events at San Juan Island, which the soldier seemed to demand instant and emphatic action. But the soldier could not well know what the diplomats were doing at a point five thousand miles away by the most rapid means of communication. He could not understand all the little international arrangements devised by the statesmen to prevent John Bull and Brother Jonathan from treading upon each others' corns, pending a little paper fight about the title to a bit of land in the Northwest.

With the magnetic telegraph at hand, however, he might have advised the Secretary of War at Washington of the fact that Mr. Cutler, having shot a trespassing bear, was in danger of being torn by the British lion, and could have asked orders as to his course. An hour or two, or a day, at most, would have brought him back an answer dictated by the wisdom of the American Cabinet, after consideration of all the facts, and all the little arrangements and understandings had between the two Governments. Of course, under such circumstances, an unfortunate misunderstanding could not occur; nor could a collision be precipitated, which, the merest trifle in itself, might nevertheless involve two great nations in war.

But see how the case stands. We have not the telegraph. Gen. Harney, compelled to act upon his own authority and without instructions, placed himself and his Government in an attitude of hostility to the British authorities, who came very near precipitating a deadly conflict, with the most mischievous results. However the difficulty may eventually be settled, it has excited ill feeling which would have been much better avoided, if possible; and, it may be, that the United States will be compelled in honor to disavow the act of its officer, and make a humiliating apology to Her Britannic Majesty for Gen. Harney's valiant defence of Mr. Cutler, the pork butcher of San Juan. Besides all this, at least two months of great uneasiness, on all sides would have been saved by means of the telegraph, to say nothing of the fatigue which the General-in-Chief of the American army must undergo in his voyage of 10,000 miles in coming to and returning from the Pacific coast. It is safe to say that, except for the forbearance of the British naval authorities in the North, a collision with Gen. Harney would have been unavoidable. The firing of a single gun would have cost the United States much more than the erection of the best possible line of magnetic telegraph from San Francisco to the Mississippi river. Will not Congress acquire a lesson from experience, and, at its approaching session, resolve the liberal economy of providing for the connection of the two oceans by telegraph without further delay.—Weekly San Francisco Bulletin.

Mr. Prentice, of the Louisville Journal, who knows as well as any man the virtues of "old Monongahela," envies the Pittsburghers their glorious supply of his favorite beverage. He says: "The Pittsburghers are fortunate; they get their delicious, pure drinking water from the Alleghany river, which bounds one side of their city, and are supplied with exhaustless quantities of Monongahela, which lave the other."

The Poor Little Maiden.

The following pathetic little poem is from the last number of the London Athenaeum:

A gentle face, and clear blue eyes,
The little Maiden bath, who pines
Her needle at the cottage door,
Or, with a comrade girl or more,
Group'd on the shady hedgerow grass,
I love to see her as I pass,
Humbly contented, simply gay,
And her singing; many a day
I've carried far along my way
From that fair infant's look and voice
A strength which made my soul rejoice.

O sad! her father died last week;
Her mother knows not where to seek Five children's food! the little Maiden
Is far too young for other's aid.
Willingly would she do her best
To slave at strangers' rude behest;
But she is young and weak. Her Thread,
From dawn till blinding rushlight sped,
Could never win her single bread.

And must the Poorhouse save alive
This Mother and her helpless five,
Where Guardians, no angelic band,
With callous eye and pinching hand,
Receive the wretched of their kin,
Cursing the law that lets them in?
I see her growing pale and thin,
Poor Child; the little needle-song
Is ended; and perhaps ere long
Her coffin jolting in their cart
To where the paupers lie apart.

Just from that cottage-step one sees
A Mansion with its lawn and trees,
Where man and wife are wearing old
Within a wilderness of gold,
Amidst all luxuries and graces,
Except the light of children's faces.
O had the little Maiden forlorn
In that fine house been only born,
How she would be tended, night and morn!
A long-tail'd pony then were hers,
And winter-mantle edged with furs,
And servants at her least command,
And wealthy suitors for her hand.

The South and the Presidency.

The following article, copied from the New York Tribune, we insert more for its raciness, and a certain lively delineation of personal traits of character and mind of the different statesmen named in it, than for any concurrence in the opinions and predictions it expresses.

"The impression is that the Democratic candidate for the Presidency will be selected from the South. A large array of statesmen from that section of the Union are competing for the Charleston nomination. With two or three exceptions, they are all of about the same grade in respect to talent and position. Perhaps Wise has the most genius; he is doubtless the most erratic and original. Silliman is the most unscrupulous intriguer, and the most malignant politician. Guthrie, like his old colleague Marcy, has a vast fund of sound sense, but is rather arbitrary and dogmatical. Cobb shows as a parliamentarian, but has measurably failed in an administrative position. Stephens was overrated as a logician while a member of the House, though his self-assurance, indomitable will, and intuitive tact, fitted him for leadership in that turbulent body. Orr, plain, practical, and taking only level views of things, has rare executive talent, and, like Hammond of the Senate, is a marvel of moderation for a South Carolina. Davis is metaphysical and analytical, wears the prim air of a martinet of the Military Academy, and is one of the ablest apostles of the Slavery Propaganda. Brown is bold and blustering, commonplace and companionable. Breckenridge is plausible and popular, smooth and superficial; but, as he insists that he is not a candidate, we exclude him from the list. We need not waste ink in exposing the absurdity of the feeble attempts to make Houston the Charleston nominee. We have thus far omitted, but not forgotten, the name of R. M. T. Hunter—a man which in our judgment, combines more than any other we have mentioned, those positive and negative qualities which the Southern Democracy need to secure all they want during the next four years, without driving over to the Opposition the great body of the Northern section of the party.

The Charleston Convention can only agree upon a candidate who has not been prominent either in supporting or opposing the novel theories on the subject of Slavery which have sprung into existence within the last dozen years. This rule, while it excludes men like Douglas on the one side, and like Davis on the other, precisely fits the case of Hunter. So, too, while the nominee must be a man whom the South will implicitly trust, he must be one whom the North can decently support. Is he, or not the sure but conciliatory, unflinching but urbane Hunter exactly that man? Reared and educated in the ultra Southern school, and always voting and acting with the States-Rights Democracy, he yet either keeps silence on all controverted questions respecting Slavery, or utters his views briefly and in ambiguous or inoffensive language.

More than twenty years ago Mr. Hunter entered the House of Representatives a moderate Calhounite. Then, as also in his early Senatorial career, he was ambitious to utter occasional speeches, carefully written and committed to memory, mystical and paradoxical with Carolina metaphysics and Virginia abstractions, glittering with sharp points, gleaming with ornate periods, and delivered with the measured gesture and mellow cadence of the Academy. He has since learned that the high road to the Presidency is paved neither with fine-spun theories nor transcendental rhetoric. Chary and practical, he now affects finance, deals largely in political economy, lauds retrenchment, speaks briefly and pointedly, rarely utters a word on questions about which the Democracy are divided, and is a straight-forward business member of the Senate. When the hour for taking up his Appropriation bill strikes, though Douglas, Seward, Toombs, Wade, Davis, and Fessenden, are holding the galleries spell-bound by a hand-to-hand combat over Cuba or Lecompton, he makes the inexorable call for "the order of the day," nor yields till the point is carried, and the Senate launched on a sea of figures, the excited combatants and spectators, chagrined at the sudden termination of the oratorical fray, retiring meanwhile to the lobbies to cool their hot blood.

Mr. Hunter is seemingly a middle-ground man, where extremes may consistently meet. He is neither the founder nor the leader of a party, like Clay and Calhoun; nor a pounder and exponent of measures, like Wright and Douglas. He never would have originated Texas annexation, or the repeal of the Missouri Compromise; nor, had he lived in the North, would he have ever dreamed of the Independent Treasury, or the Wilnot Proviso; nor, had he been compelled to fight the Illinois battle, would he have been supple and agile enough to escape defeat under a cloud of generalities about Popular Sovereignty and unfriendly legislation in the Territories.

Mr. Hunter has none of the infirmities of genius, because he has no constitutional predisposition to the disease. Calm, considerate, and strictly parliamentary, he is never liable to be called to order, and always shuns those personal collisions in which Douglas, Toombs, Wade, Fitch, Hale, Iverson, Green, and other courageous or impulsive Senators, North and South, are so often involved. These qualities, combined with a prudence which trenches on the neighboring of timidity, make him rather a commonplace parliamentarian. Though his speeches show research and ability, and exhibit an occasional tasteful and polished passage, they never startle by their originality, nor electrify by their eloquence. In that mental and social magnetism which characterizes leaders, he falls immeasurably behind Clay. In intellectual caliber he belongs rather to the type of Wright, but is his inferior in power of argument and sinks out of his sight in comparative breadth of views and liberality of opinions. With no salient points and acute angles, to startle and repel, like Douglas, and with none of Wise's proclivity to commit follies, he is just the smooth, oval man, easily approached and easily handled, whom the Democracy need as a rallying point in this crisis.

Can he be nominated? To take even the first step in that direction, he must be backed by Virginia. And here he meets a serious obstacle in the person of Gov. Wise, whom he must either crush, appease, or purchase. The gallant Governor is hard to kill, difficult to conciliate, and costly to buy. If the Donnelly letter has dampened his hopes, it has inflamed his animosities. He is more to be dreaded when fighting an enemy, than when defending himself. He has many friends in Virginia, and through all the South. They know that the New York Softs betrayed the Donnelly letter to ruin him. And they believe that of all the Southern candidates, Hunter is the favorite of the Softs. Unless Wise is a weaker antagonist than is generally supposed, Hunter must drive, coax, or bribe him out of his path, or he will prove a serious stumbling-block in his journey to Charleston.

A down-east poet describes thus, after the style of Longfellow, the eloquent of a maiden with an Indian lover, and the merry of the susceptible damsel by a haughty father:

Tell us how the dusky Indian Met and won the pale-faced maiden;
And from her father's mansion
A great and wicked city,
To the deep and mighty ocean—
How she fled from home and parents,
The school-girl, young and handsome,
Her lover, Johnny Newell,
To the west or to the westward,
His wigwam small and smoky,
On the margin of a river
Flowing through a country village—
How she dwelt within his wigwam,
Side of poles and woven cotton,
Sleeping on the damp earth's bosom,
On a ragged Indian blanket,
Through the chilly nights of autumn,
And the harvest moon shone brightly—
How on the quiet landscape
Her father missed his daughter,
How he and then the fact discovered,
That a young and swarthy Indian
Had decoyed her to his wigwam,
That wigwam cold and cheerless,
On the margin of a river,
Near a pleasant country village,
Where the bun of looms and spindles
Oret the ear from morn till evening—
How the angry, injured father,
Went himself with a revolver,
Seeking vengeance on John Newell,
Who, the "cussed little Indian,"
Had robbed him of his daughter,
And made a dirty swag of,
And to tend his red papooses,
In a tent of poles and cotton—
How he sought his lost Maria,
Sought and found her Sunday morning—
Early morning, bright and lovely,
In a smoky Indian wigwam,
With her lover, Johnny Newell,
Whom whose presence she was taken,
From back to Boston City,
Boston City near the ocean.
There the deeply injured father
Slandered his erring daughter, Spanked her smartly, as he ought to!"

Personal Character of Daniel Webster.

We have already published one extract from the eloquent oration of Edward Everett, delivered on the presentation of the bronze statue of Webster, in Boston. But the following close to that admirable effort is a passage of too much beauty, and contains too fervent a spirit of patriotism, to be omitted. Great as was Daniel Webster, his fame receives additional luster from the genius of Everett:

"This is not the occasion to dwell upon the personal character of Mr. Webster, on the fascinations of his social intercourse, or the charm of his domestic life. Something I could have said on his companionable dispositions and habits, his genial temper, the resources and attractions of his conversation, his love of nature, alike in her wild and cultivated aspects, and his keen perception of the beauties of this fair world in which we live; something of his devotion to agricultural pursuits, which, next to his professional and public duties, formed the occupation of his life; something of his fondness for athletic and manly sports and exercises, something of his friendships, and of his attachments warmer than friendships—the son, the brother, the husband and the father; something of the joys and sorrows of his home,—of the strength of his religious convictions, his testimony to the truth of the Christian Revelation; the tenderness and sublimity of the parting scene. Something of these topics I have elsewhere said, and may not here repeat.

Some other things, my friends, with your indulgence, I would say: thoughts, memories, which crowd upon me, too vivid to be repressed, too personal almost to be uttered.

On the 17th of July, 1804, a young man from New Hampshire arrived in Boston, all but penniless, and all but friendless. He was twenty-two years of age, and had come to take the first steps in the career of life at the capital of New England. His only introduction was by a young man as little known to Mr. Gore as himself, and who went to pronounce his name, which he did so indistinctly as not to be heard. His slender figure, striking appearance, large dark eye and nascent brow, his general appearance indicating a delicate organization, his manly carriage and modest demeanor, arrested attention and inspired confidence. His humble suit was granted, he was received into the office, and had been there a week before Mr. Gore learned that his name was Daniel Webster! His older brother—older in years, but later in entering life—(for whose education

But the soldier could not well know what the diplomats were doing at a point five thousand miles away by the most rapid means of communication. He could not understand all the little international arrangements devised by the statesmen to prevent John Bull and Brother Jonathan from treading upon each others' corns, pending a little paper fight about the title to a bit of land in the Northwest.

With the magnificent telegraph at hand, however, he might have advised the Secretary of War at Washington of the fact that Mr. Cutler, having shot a trespassing bear, was in danger of being torn by the British lion, and could have asked orders as to his course. An hour or two, or a day, at most, would have brought him back an answer dictated by the wisdom of the American Cabinet, after consideration of all the facts, and all the little arrangements and understandings had between the two Governments. Of course, under such circumstances, an unfortunate misunderstanding could not occur; nor could a collision be precipitated, which, the merest trifle in itself, might nevertheless involve two great nations in war.

But see how the case stands. We have not the telegraph. Gen. Harney, compelled to act upon his own authority and without instructions, placed himself and his Government in an attitude of hostility to the British authorities, who came very near precipitating a deadly conflict, with the most mischievous results. However the difficulty may eventually be settled, it has excited ill feeling which would have been much better avoided, if possible; and, it may be, that the United States will be compelled in honor to disavow the act of its officer, and make a humiliating apology to Her Britannic Majesty for Gen. Harney's valiant defence of Mr. Cutler, the pork butcher of San Juan. Besides all this, at least two months of great uneasiness, on all sides would have been saved by means of the telegraph, to say nothing of the fatigue which the General-in-Chief of the American army must undergo in his voyage of 10,000 miles in coming to and returning from the Pacific coast. It is safe to say that, except for the forbearance of the British naval authorities in the North, a collision with Gen. Harney would have been unavoidable. The firing of a single gun would have cost the United States much more than the erection of the best possible line of magnetic telegraph from San Francisco to the Mississippi river. Will not Congress acquire a lesson from experience, and, at its approaching session, resolve the liberal economy of providing for the connection of the two oceans by telegraph without further delay.—Weekly San Francisco Bulletin.

Mr. Prentice, of the Louisville Journal, who knows as well as any man the virtues of "old Monongahela," envies the Pittsburghers their glorious supply of his favorite beverage. He says: "The Pittsburghers are fortunate; they get their delicious pure drinking water from the Alleghany river, which bounds one side of their city, and are supplied with exhaustless quantities of Monongahela, which lave the other."

The Poor Little Maiden.]

The following pathetic little poem is from the last number of the London Athenaeum:

A gentle face, and clear blue eyes,
The little Maiden bath, who plies
Her needle at the cottage door,
Or, with a comrade girl or more,
Group'd on the shady hedgerow grass,
I love to see her as I pass,
Humbly contented, simply gay,
And hear singing; many a day
I've carried far along my way
From that fair infant's look and voice
A strength which made my soul rejoice.

O sad! her father died last week;
Her mother knows not where to seek Five children's food! the little Maid
Is far too young for other's aid.
Willingly would she do her best
To slave at strangers' rude behest;
But she is young and weak. Her Threat,
From dawn till blinding midnight sped,
Could never win her single bread.

And must the Poorhouse save alive
This Mother and her helpless five,
Where Guardians, no angelic band,
With callous eye and plucking hand,
Receive the wretched of their kin,
Cursing the law that lets them in?
I see her growing pale and thin,
Poor Child; the little needle-song
Is ended; and perhaps ere long
Her coffin jolling in their cart
To where the paupers lie apart.

Just front that cottage-step one sees
A Mansion with its lawn and trees,
Where man and wife are wearing old
Within a wilderness of gold,
Amidst all luxuries and graces,
Except the light of children's faces.
O had the little Maid forlorn
In that fine house been only born,
How else were tended, night and morn,
A long-tail'd pony then were hers,
And winter-mantle edged with fur,
And servants at her least command,
And wealth by suitors for her hand.

"The impression is that the Democratic candidate for the Presidency will be selected from the South. A large array of statesmen from that section of the Union are competing for the Charleston nomination. Within two or three exceptions, they are all of about the same grade in respect to talent and position. Perhaps Wise has the most genius; he is doubtless the most erratic and original. Sill is the most unscrupulous intriguer, and the most malignant politician. Guthrie, like his old colleague Marcy, has a vast fund of sound sense, but is rather arbitrary and dogmatical. Cobb shone as a parliamentarian, but has measurably failed in an administrative position. Stephens was overrated as a logician while a member of the House, though his self-assurance, indomitable will, and intuitive tact, fitted him for leadership in that turbulent body. Orr, plain, practical, and taking only level views of things, has rare executive talent, and, like Hammond of the Senate, is a marvel of moderation for a South Carolina. Davis is metaphysical and analytical, wears the prim air of a martinet of the Military Academy, and is one of the ablest apostles of the Slavery Propaganda. Brown is bold and blustering, commonplace and companionable. Breckenridge is plausible and popular, smooth and superficial; but, as he insists that he is not a candidate, we exclude him from the list. We need not waste ink in exposing the absurdity of the feeble attempts to make Houston the Charleston nominee. We have thus far omitted, but not forgotten, the name of R. M. T. Hunter—a man which in our judgment, combines, more than any other we have mentioned, those positive and negative qualities which the Southern Democracy need to secure all they want during the next four years, without driving over to the Opposition the great body of the Northern section of the party.

The Charleston Convention can only agree upon a candidate who has not been prominent either in supporting or opposing the novel theories on the subject of Slavery which have sprung into existence within the last dozen years. This rule, while it excludes men like Douglas on the one side, and like Davis, on the other, precisely fits the case of Hunter. So, too, while the nominee must be a man whom the South will implicitly trust, he must be one whom the North can decently support. Is not the sure but conciliatory, the unflinching but urbane Hunter exactly that man? Reared and educated in the ultra Southern school, and always voting and acting with the States-Rights Democracy, he yet either keeps silence on all controverted questions respecting Slavery, or utters his views briefly and in ambiguous or inoffensive language.

More than twenty years ago Mr. Hunter entered the House of Representatives a moderate Calhounite. Then, as also in his early Senatorial career, he was ambitious to utter occasional speeches, carefully written and committed to memory, mystical and paradoxical with Carolina metaphysics and Virginia abstractions, glittering with sharp points, gleaming with ornate periods, and delivered with the measured gesture and mellow cadence of the Academy.—He has since learned that the high road to the Presidency is paved neither with fine-spun theories nor transcendental rhetoric. Chary and practical, he now affects finance, deals largely in political economy, lauds retrenchment, speaks broadly and pointedly, rarely utters a word on questions about which the Democracy are divided, and is a straight-forward business member of the Senate. When the hour for taking up his Appropriation bill strikes, though Douglas, Seward, Toombs, Wade, Davis, and Fessenden, are holding the galleries spell-bound by a hand-to-hand combat over Cuba or Lecompton, he makes the inexorable call for "the order of the day," nor yields till the point is carried, and the Senate launched on a sea of figures, the excited combatants and spectators, chagrined at the sudden termination of the oratorical fray, retiring meanwhile to the lobbies to cool their hot blood.

Mr. Hunter is seemingly a middle-ground man, where extremes may consistently meet. He is neither the founder nor the leader of a party, like Clay and Calhoun; nor a proponent and exponent of measures, like Wright and Douglas. He never would have originated Texas annexation, or the repeal of the Missouri Compromise; nor, had he lived in the North, would he have ever dreamed of the Independent Treasury, or the Villot Proviso; nor, had he been compelled to fight the Illinois battle, would he have been supple and agile enough to escape defeat under a cloud of generalities about Popular Sovereignty and unfriendly legislation in the Territories.

Mr. Hunter has none of the infirmities of genius, because he has no constitutional predisposition to the disease. Calm, considerate, and strictly parliamentary, he is never liable to be called to order, and always shuns those personal collisions in which Douglas, Toombs, Wade, Fitch, Hagle, Iverson, Green, and other courageous or impulsive Senators, North and South, are so often involved. These qualities, combined with a prudence which trenches on the neighboring of timidity, make him rather a commonplace parliamentarian. Though his speeches show research and ability, and exhibit an occasional tasteful and polished passage, they never startle by their originality, nor electrify by their eloquence. In that mental and social magnetism which characterizes leaders, he falls immeasurably behind Clay. In intellectual caliber he belongs rather to the type of Wright, but is his inferior in power of argument and sinks out of his sight in comparative breadth of views and liberality of opinions. With no salient points and acute angles, to startle and repel, like Douglas, and with none of Wise's proclivity to commit follies, he is just the smooth, oral man, easily approached and easily handled, whom the Democracy need as a rallying point in this crisis.

Can he be nominated? To take even the first step in that direction, he must be backed by Virginia.—And here he meets a serious obstacle in the person of Gov. Wise, whom he must either crush, appease, or purchase. The gallant Governor is hard to kill, difficult to conciliate, and costly to buy. If the Donnelly letter has dampened his hopes, it has inflamed his animosities. He is more to be dreaded when fighting an enemy, than when defending himself.—He has many friends in Virginia, and through all the South. They know that the New York Softs betrayed the Donnelly letter to ruin him.—And they believe that of all the Southern candidates, Hunter is the favorite of the Softs. Unless Wise is a weaker antagonist than is generally supposed, Hunter must drive, coax, or bribe him out of his path, or he will prove a serious stumbling-block in his journey to Charleston.

POISSON FUR AT THE LURENOR.—Louis Napoleon lately been making a tour of his provincial towns. The respondent of the Echo du gets off the following little pleasantry at his Majesty's which we translate, and insert in our columns.—San Francisco

The excursion of the Emperor to Tarbes and Saint-Sauveur made the occasion of a oration. The Bishop made a long—perhaps, a speech to his Majesty, in recalled the fact that in that hood was located a chapel, in 1807 Queen Hortense, pilgrimage to invoke the He to bestow upon her another place of the boy who had the lost; and that the Queen had celebrated, by a sole, her gratitude to the Virgin, answering her vows, by the birth of a son, who, forty years called to reign over the France. PARODY.

BY CHAS. W. BIRD.

As was heard from the watchman's
 In the wide streets we hurried
 And who in the "dark" was shot,
 As would have to be buried.
 In by daylight at dead of night,
 As a street corner looking;
 As was found—O Lord what a sight
 As was for spurning.
 As were the words we said,
 As were filled with sorrow;
 As a light on the face of the dead
 As the thought of the morrow.
 As better be taken to bed,
 As dead be laid on a pillow;
 As the news would deliverly spread
 As the plate and the billow.
 As I speak of him when he goes—
 As exclaims upbraid him—
 As he now, if they'll let him sleep
 As on the rum where we've laid him.
 As he closed his breast,
 As, out in about we bound him;
 As a Saviour taking his rest,
 As had been all drinking around him.
 As our heavy task was done,
 As clock told the hour for retiring;
 As in the distance some son of a gun,
 As one ferociously firing.
 As we left him alone
 As of his fate and his story
 As a lie, and started it on
 As with the old story.

 a these lectures are made ps and odds and ends from old reviews, magazines and encyclopedias—a patchwork put clumsily

 and unskillfully together, without consistency, symmetry or unity of design.

Thus the literary chifftimers, without original ideas, without brains,
 and without a liberal education, go to work at the Astor Library or some other, and produce a worthless lecture, the copyright of which would not sell for $20. No good newspaper would deem it worth $5. Yet this is delivered the first time for $50, perhaps for $100, and the doc-is repeated to other audiences on the same terms, till it has gone the rounds of the "literary societies."
 An original book, with solid information or pleasant reading, worth a hundred lectures, might be purchased for the price of admission, and would be worth nearly what was paid for it in twenty years after, whereas the lecturer leaves nothing behind him worth preserving. So incompetent are many of these literateurs
 who thus make a living by cheating simpletons with their wares, like "Peter Funk," who passes off upon a green countryman a pinchbeck or or galvanized watch for pure gold,
 that they could not write a decent article for a first class journal if it were to save their necks from the gallows. What gives them security is the fact that their compositions are not worth reporting in the newspapers, for if once published they could not be repeated, and the lecturer would have to commence de novo to get up another essay, and this process would not pay. Their publication, moreover, might provoke some scathing criticisms, and this would be ruinous in a double sense. The lecturers are therefore continually at the mercy of the newspapers, and they beg hard of the reporters not to publish them in full, but only to "give just a little notice of them"—a very unnecessary request on their part and which they would never make if they only knew in what contempt their performances are held both by reporters and editors. The chief merit of some of these affairs is in the delivery, or in the elaborations of high-sounding verbiage, which tickles the ear for the moment, but leaves not a trace of an idea or a shadow of information on the mind.
 there is no connection, no arguments,
 no facts, nothing that can be remembered.

The literary societies and committees make a good thing of these lectures on the whole, though sometimes they are "done brown" by failures.
 They use their local influence and put forth all their exertions in selling the tickets, which they often get off their hands under the most fraudulent representations. Without such appliances none of the lecturers who go about the country could make their expenses. There was a time when some rather clever men had a monopoly of the business, and made a handsome income out of it; but those days are gone by, and now the thing is overdone, and driven into the ground, and scarcely any able man will accept an invitation to lecture.
 If he does, he follows in the beaten track, and will not bestow the pains required for a good original composition. He depends on his reputation and his name, and with these cheat the audience out of their quarters. Some of the fools think they are amply repaid by seeing his face.
 Many clergymen thus add to their incomes by lectures which cost them less toil and have less merit than one of their ordinary sermons. The truth is that the talent, learning and labor necessary to produce a good lecture could not be purchased by any literary society; for if the lecture had decided merit it could not be repeated, and would pay worse than the poorest composition. The newspapers would report it on its first delivery, and give it to the reader, with a variety of other interesting matter,
 for two cents, thus destroying its marketable value to the writer. It would pay him better, therefore to send it to a review or to publish it in the form of a book.

While we express these opinions of the lecture system generally we are aware that there are some exceptions—"like angels visits, few and far between"—in which both profit and pleasure may be derived by the audience. Among these may be classed such lectures as those delivered by Dr. Livingstone, giving an account of his own experience in new and untolden countries in Africa, and of Dr. Kane, whose interesting and instructive descriptions, from personal observation, of wonderful Arctic regions, where civilized man had never set foot before, furnished food for the intellect and the imagination of his delighted audiences. The lectures of such men as Lardner, Herschel, and our own Professor Mitchell, giving an account in glowing language of their own discoveries, or those recently made by other scientific men, may also be ranked among the exceptions to the general rule, and, with a very few others,

 may be regarded as oases in the bar-ren desert of the lecture system, which has become the last refuge of literary loafers on both sides of the Atlantic.

Anecdote of Lord Brougham.

We have heard (and the story has an air of vraisemblance) that one day
 as Brougham was leaving the House of Lords, he met a friend who was proudly escorting two very handsome young ladies.

"Ah! Brougham," was his greet-
 ing. "I am sorry you are leaving;
 because my fair young friends had made up their minds to hear you address the House."

"Then," retorted Brougham, casting an eye of admiration upon his expectant audience, "they shall not be disappointed."

And forthwith he returned into his accustomed place among the peers, whilst the ladies were escorted to the gallery. Lord Melbourne was then in office, and when the first pause in the proceedings occurred,
 up jumps Brougham with a question upon some intricate matter of foreign policy. The poor premier smiles amiably, but helplessly; he is not acquainted with the facts; no notice has been given of the question; he is very sorry, but must inquire for information. This was all that Brougham required. Once more he rises, but this time with that terrible frown upon his brow, and that rugged voice with which he knew
 so well how to crush an opponent.
 A philippic against the incapacity
 of the ministry, the negligence with which public affairs were conducted,
 the shameful supineness and indifference manifested by the advisers of the Queen, was poured forth with all the rough strength, rapid eloquence of which this man alone was capable.
 Lord Melbourne covered in his seat;
 the rumors of this great speech
 brought loungers from the Commons
 to listen to what seemed the death blow of the ministry; Queen Victoria herself heard what was going on,
 and trembled for her amiable minister. A leading article appeared in the next morning's Times, treating the speech as something of the last importance, and it was only made after all to please a pair of pretty women in the gallery, who took it as they would any other tribute of homage to their beauty—a bouquet,
 a box at the opera, a whitebait dinner
 or a new bonnet.

It is a current anecdote about the Edinburgh Review, that, upon one occasion, Brougham being in want of money, wrote to Constable for a thousand pounds, coolly stating that he should soon clear it off by his writing in the Edinburgh, and that some time during the said process
 of "clearing" a number came of which Brougham had written every article but two.

How DIFFERENT PERSONS VIEW THE SAME THINGS.—A lady in Syracuse lately fell out of a fourth story window and was preserved from injury, her crinoline expanded in the air catching under and letting her down gently, parachute
 like. A young gentleman, of a poetical temperament, who happened to see this feat from a distance, likened the appearance of the woman in her descent
 to that of a vast pile of fleecy clouds, rapidly descending the horizon; while a matter-of-fact Dutchman, who had a much nearer view, said she looked to him just like "one huge umbrella, with two sticks."

A most valuable discovery of diamonds has lately been made at the foot of the Orak Mountains, Russia. One consigned to Mr. R— of Bathaston, as a specimen, brought the lucky owner the enormous sum of £80,000. There is every reason to believe that a mine of inexhaustible wealth has been discovered.

A RETORT DIRECT.—A clergyman
 from a neighboring town, and one of his elderly parishioners were walking home
 from church one icy day last winter,
 when the old gentleman slipped and fell on his back. The minister, looking at him a moment, and being assured that he was not much hurt, said to him,
 "Friend, sinners stand on slippery places." The old gentleman looked up, as if to assure himself of the fact, and said,
 "I see they do, but I can't."—Providence

 The gift is a splendid one, and is val-

HOMICIDE IN CARSON VALLEY.—
 Carson City, Sept. 13th. The San Francisco Herald of the 14th, says:
 This morning at 13 miles from this place, J. Newman, restaurant keeper, and sailer Jack, waiter, had some difficulty settling accounts. Jack drew his pistol and dropped it, and by the time he picked it up to fire,
 Newman shot him, killing instantly.
 Newman came to this place and gave himself up to U. S. Marshal Winters, and awaits the action of Judge Cradelbaugh, who is now in California.

"Women's rights, women's nonsense," said Rosa Bonheur, on being questioned as to her feelings on the subject. "Women should seek to establish their rights by good and great works, and not by conventions.
 If I had got up a convention to debate
 the question of my ability to paint the 'Horse Fair,' for which England paid me forty thousand francs, the decision would have been against me. I felt the power within me to paint, and I cultivated it."

 tlemen who signed the famous Pike's Peak report with Mr. Greeley, and a very clever, spirited writer, proposes to lecture

The Republic at the Peleto.

A sudden spirit of angry fire,
With wreaths of vapor curling higher,
Break through the silent air;
And ere the loosened matting falls,
From half the curtained fortress walls
A hundred guns are bare.

For comes at last the battle-hell;
Trough oak and iron, shot and shell,
In quick succession crash
The clouds of smoke conceal the sun,
And thundering gun replies to gun,
And flash succeedeth flash.

Replinters from the blood-stained deck
The arrows fly, but cannot check
The British seaman's fire.
He lot his vessel sink or swim,
He dence a care is that to him,
If fighting he expire.

rain, ravenous strain your arms and blades!
Through mud and water Britain wades,
Despite their howls and shooting,
Press onward through the iron rain,
And rudely trample down the slain,
I will give you firmer footing!

And in the blue, the ghastly light—
The mud shall be your bed to-night;
They plunge and choking sink:
No waste to bear you through the storm,
To doctors and to chloroform!
Work your fate and doom!

Masacred to Moloch's might,
Baseless, ill-conducted fight;
There let them fall and sleep;
They yield a crop of K. O. B.'s,
Although across the rolling seas
Some gentle eyes may weep.

Now sound the requiem through the fleet;
The mud is all their winding sheet,
Their lullaby the wave!
While rude Mongolians boast ground,
Over all the wide celestial ground,
How good the foreign devils found
A bullet-furrowed grave.

They sleep with many thousands more—
On Balava's rock built shore,
On wind-swept Inkermann;
And with the nobles of the brave,
No found a sun-steeped Indian grave
In further Hindostan.

We soldier! Never country bred
Be sons more free from craven dread,
Who calmer dare to stand;
And gaze into the eyes of Death,
Or murmur, with their parting breath,
The war-cry of their land.

[China Mail, (Hongkong).]

The following is Horace Greeley's closing letter, written from California during his late tour, and contains the summing up of his opinions in regard to the State, its inhabitants, prospects, etc. The letter is an interesting one and will repay a perusal:

An Overland Journey.

XXXIII.
CALIFORNIA—SUMMING UP.
SAN FRANCISCO, Cal.,
Sept. 4-5, 1859.

The entire area of this State is officially estimated as containing a fraction less than one hundred millions of acres; but, as this total includes bays as well as lakes, rivers, &c., the actual extent of unsubmerged land can hardly exceed ninety millions of acres, or rather more than twice the area of New Hampshire or Vermont—perhaps twice the area of New York. It is only a fraction of my part, but one founded on considerable travel and observation, which makes not more than one-third of this extent—say thirty millions of acres—properly arable; the residue being either ruggedly mountainous, hopelessly desert, or absorbed in the marshes which line the San Joaquin and perhaps some other rivers. The arable thirty millions of acres—nearly the area of all New England except Maine—are scarcely equalled in capacity of production by any like area on earth. They embrace the best vineyards on this continent, to an extent of many millions of acres—a area capable of producing all the

Wine and all the Raisins annually consumed on the globe. All the fruits of the temperate zone are grown here in great luxuriance and perfection, together with the Fig, Olive, &c., to which the Lemon and Orange may be added in the South. No other land on earth produces Wheat, Rye, and Barley so largely with so little labor as the great majority of these thirty million acres; a portion of them are well adapted also to Indian Corn. To stock-growing in an easy, slovenly, reckless way, this mild climate and fertile soil also lend themselves readily; yet I must believe that many more acres are required here to graze a thousand head of cattle than in New York or Kentucky, and that the capacities of California to furnish beef and milk in this poor fashion have been taxed very nearly to the utmost. Doubtless, four, six, or even ten times the present number of cattle will be fed here at some future day, but not wholly on the spontaneous growth of the valleys and hillsides. Nay, I hear already that, as the Wild Oats and natural grasses are closely fed year after year, so as to preclude their seeding or prevent the seed falling to the earth and germinating, they gradually die out, and are supplanted by course, worthless weeds. Evidently—and I rejoice over the fact—the day of ranches, or broad, unfenced domains, over which the cattle of the owner range at will, protected only by his brand from indiscriminate appropriation, is passing away for ever. And it is high time. Though the range is yet many acres per head, and the feed ample for the greater part of the year, yet the cows of California give less milk to-day than a like number kept for milk on any other portion of the globe. The dry grass and stubble on which they subsist keep them in fair flesh, but furnishes scanty overplus for butter and cheese. Good butter is worth fifty cents and over per pound, and has generally at this season a white insipid look, like that made in winter at the East. Cheese commands twenty-five cents per pound; and is seldom seen on hotel or private tables. Yet the production, though meager, is rapidly increasing; the little valleys opening directly on the Pacific, and thus kept green by its fogs and damp winds, in spite of the six months' absence of rain, yielding it most abundantly. A cheese weighing seven hundred and fifty pounds, the product of a single dairy, is now here, on its way to the State Fair at Sacramento; the large store in which I saw it is full of California-made cheese, from basement to attic. Yet California does not nearly supply her own wants, whether of cheese or butter, and never will until her dairymen shall deem it profitable to shelter their stock in winter and supply them with green fodder in later Summer and Fall. Whenever they shall generally devote one quarter of their lands to growing Chilian Clover, Sowed Corn, Beets, Parsnips and Carrots, wherewith to feed their cows, from August to February, they will make twice or thrice their present product of butter and cheese, and prove theirs one of the best dairy regions on earth. But habits, especially bad ones, are stubborn things, and they will only come to this wisdom by degrees.

Whether California would be a better country if it had rain in Summer, I have already somewhat considered. That it would be more inviting and attractive in aspect, especially to those unaccustomed to such sterility through the latter half of each year, cannot be doubted. With such rain, its natural pasturage would suffice for twice its present number of cattle, while cultivation could be extended far up into the mountains, on lands now deemed arable only when irrigated. Yet, on the other hand, these dry summers have their advantages. By their aid, the most bountiful harvests of hay and grain are secured in the best order, and by means of the least possible labor. Weeds are not half so inveterate and troublesome here as in rainy countries. A given amount of labor accomplishes far more in any direction than at the East. The wise man may start on a journey, of business or pleasure, without consulting his barometer, and the fool without looking into his almanac. Nobody, save in winter or early spring, ever casts an apprehensive look at the skies; it may be cloudy or foggy, as it often is; but you know it cannot rain till next November, and lay your plans accordingly. I have passed large fields of standing wheat that have been dead ripe for at least a month; they will shell some when cut, but the grain will be bright and plump as ever. All through the grain region, you see wheat that has been thrashed and sacked, and piled up in the open field where it grew, to await the farmer's convenience in taking it to market; and it may lie so for months without damage, unless from squirrels or gophers. Wheat is sown throughout the winter, though the earlier sown is the surer. Plowing commences with the rains, and sowing should follow as closely as may be. Very decent crops of "volunteer" grain are often grown, by simply harrowing in the seed shelled out and lost in the process of harvesting—sometimes even though the harrowing is omitted. But the ground squirrels are apt to intercept this process by filling the grain fields with their holes, and eating up all the scattered grain and a good deal more. They are a great pest in many localities, and strychnine is freely and effectively employed to diminish their numbers.

I have estimated that barely one-third of the total area of unsubmerged California is perfectly arable, but it would be a great mistake to suppose the residue worthless. At least thirty millions of acres more are covered by rugged hills and mountain, mainly timbered—much of the timber being large and of the best quality. Yellow, Pitch and Sugar Pine—the Pitch Pine being scarcely akin to its stunted and scrubby New England namesake, but a tall and valuable tree—the Sugar being nearly identical with our white Pine, save that its sap is saccharine—White Cedar, Redwood, Spruce, Balsam Fir—all these averaging at least twice the size of the trees in any forest I ever saw elsewhere, while the Balsam is just the most shapely and graceful tree on earth—such are the forests which cover all but the snowy peaks of the mountains of California. Trees six to eight feet through are as common in the Sierra Nevada, and I hear in the Coast Range also, as those three to four feet in diameter are (or were) in the pine forests of New York and New England. Consider that these giants look down on the gold mines wherein a very large proportion of the most active population of this State must for ages be employed, while the agricultural districts lie just below them, and even the seaboard cities are but a day's ride further, and the value of these forests becomes apparent. The day is not distant—there are those living who will see it—when what is now California will have a population of three to six millions; then eligible timber lands in the Sierra will be worth more per acre than would now be paid for farms in the richest valleys near San Francisco.

The timber of the lower hills and plains is generally Oak—short bodied, wide-spreading, and of poor quality, save for fuel, being brash (easily broken, like a clay pipe stem) and not durable. The more common variety looks like the White Oak found in New England pastures, but resembles it in looks only. Live Oak is next in abundance, and also a poor article. It has a smooth, dark bark, a short, crooked trunk, a profusion of good-for-nothing limbs, and small deep green leaves, which defy the frosts of winter. The trunk is often barked by Vandalism for tanning, leaving the tree standing alive, but certain to die. Black and Rock Oak are found in some of the mountain valleys; and seem to be of fair quality. Large Cottonwood and Sycamore line some of the streams, but very sparingly. Her Evergreens are the pride of California.

The gold mines are generally found among the foot-hills of the Sierra, or in the beds of the streams which traverse those hills. In many instances, hills now tower where rivers once ran—how long since, who may tell? Trees in a state of semi-petrification are dug out from under hundreds of feet of solid earth, which seems to have lain undisturbed since creation. The beds of ancient lakes are

Of course, I do not think that the gold mines of California will ever be thoroughly worked out—certainly not in the next thousand years; yet I do not anticipate any considerable increase in their annual production, because I deem $50,000,000 per annum as much as can be taken out at a profit under existing circumstances. The early miners of California reaped what nature had been quietly sowing thro' countless thousands of years. Through the action of frost and fire, growth and decay, air and water, she had been slowly wearing down the primitive rocks in which the gold was originally deposited, washing away the lighter matter, and concentrating the gold thus gleaned from cubic miles of stubborn quartz and granite in a few cubic feet of earth at the bottom of her water courses. Many a miner has thus taken out in a day gold which could not have been extracted from the rock where it first grew in many weeks. Even the hills in which it is now mainly found can be washed down at one dollar or less per cubic yard by the best hydraulic appliances. But when the miner is brought face to face with the rough granite, which he must drill and blast and tunnel for all the gold he gets, the case is bravely altered. He may make money here; he sometimes does; but I am sure that, up to this hour, not one quartz-mining enterprise in every four has paid its bare expenses; and, tho' there will be brilliant exceptions, I am confident that quartz mining, as a whole, will not pay for many years to come. Either labor must be cheaper, or the process of quartz-mining far more economical and efficient, or the yield per ton much greater, before one undeniably auriferous quartz-vein in ten will pay the cost of working it. And, while I presume improvements will from time to time be made, I hear doubtfully the talk of sanguine inventors and operators of doubling the product of gold by this or that new amalgamator or other device. So many of these contrivances have proved futile or of little worth, that I wait. Chemical tests prove that but a portion of the gold actually contained in the vein-stone (especially if a sulphuret) is now obtained by the crushing and washing process; but how soon or by what process this proportion may be increased I do not know—who does? And until it shall be, I must consider quartz-mining, with labor at the present rates, the poorest business now prosecuted in California. A few, who have struck pockets rather than veins of peculiarly rich quartz, are making a good thing of it, and their luck is in every one's mouth; but of the hundreds who drive up long adits, through dead rock, or sink costly shafts to strike a vein at the best point, and find it, after all, too poor to pay for working, little is said or thought till they drop into the gulf of acknowledged bankruptcy and pass away. I believe fewer quartz-veins are being worked to-day than were some years ago; I think fewer still will be worked a year hence, and thenceforward, until cheaper labor or more effective processes shall have rendered quartz-mining a very different business. And until such change is effected, I apprehend that the annual gold product of California will not be essentially augmented.

POPULATION—EDUCATION—MORALS.

The total population of Upper California (our California in contradistinction to the peninsula still held by Mexico,) was estimated, on the 1st of January, 1849, at 26,000; viz: natives of the country (not including Indian,) 13,000; U. States Americans, 8,000; Europeans, 5,000. The aborigines were estimated, in 1856, by Col. Henley, Superintendent of Indian Affairs, at 65,000. I believe this a gross exaggeration. Six Indian reservations have been officially established in different sections of the State, on which all the Indians have been gathered that could be, and these amount to barely 17,205, according to the official returns, which, being the basis of requisitions on the Government, are certainly not to fall below the truth. I do not believe there are so many more Indians in the State; and, whatever may be the number, it is steadily and rapidly diminishing. These Indians are generally idle and depraved, while the white men, who come in contact with them are often rascals and ruffians, who hold that Indians have "no rights which white men are bound to respect." By these, the poor savages are intruded upon, hunted, abused, robbed, outraged, until they are themselves driven to acts of violence, when a "war" ensues, and they are butchered without mercy. If an honest census of the various tribes and bands be taken in 1860, their number will not be found to much exceed 30,000, which 1870 will find reduced to 10,000. The native or Spanish Californians are already reduced in number since 1849, and are now mainly confined to the southern agricultural counties. I have not seen half a dozen of them in a month's travel through the heart of the State.

The census of 1850 made the total population of California (Indians not counted) 92,597, but there were some counties from which no returns were received, which, it was estimated, would increase the aggregate to 117,538. Only two years thereafter, a State census was taken, which increased the number to 264,435—it having more than doubled (by immigration) in two years. Of this number, only 22,193 were females—less than one-tenth of the whole; while the great majority were men in the vigorous prime of life. The state of public morals among a population so disproportioned, in a land far removed from the restraining influences of home and kindred, were better imagined than described.

To-day, the total population of the Golden State (excluding Indians) is probably not less than half a million: the census of 1860 will doubtless give a still larger aggregate. Of these, I judge that some 50,000 are Chinese, with about an equal number of Europeans or Mexicans, not including those who by treaty or naturalization have become American citizens. Of the half million, probably 75,000 are under 18 years of age, while perhaps an equal number and girls over 18, though this would leave 350,000, including boys over 18, in the prime of life—vigorous, enterprising and industrious idlers and drones here; but there probably before a community of happy people capable of doing work in a year as this poor California. The facts mine gold to the extent of millions of dollars annually, yielding four millions of bushels of millions of bushels with large amounts of oil and an ample supply of and fruits for home consumption would go far toward estate point. But the industry produces important results are not exhibited above. The Union is making strides in building, fencing farms, setting fruit trees stock, &c. The Repulse at the Peiho.

A sudden spirit of angry fire,
With wreaths of vapor curling higher,
Break through the silent air;
And ere the loosened matting falls,
From half the curtained fortress walls
A hundred guns are bare.

Now comes at last the battle-hell;
Through oak and iron, ad and shell
In quick succession crash;
The clouds of smoke conceal the sun,
And thundering gun replies to gun,
And flash succeedeth flash.

The splinters from the blood-stained deck
Like arrows fly, but cannot check
The British seaman's fire.
Not let his vessel sink or swim,
The deuce a care is that to him,
If fighting he expire.

Strain, rovers! strain your arms and blades!
Through mud and water Britain wades,
Despite their bows and shooting.
Press onward through the iron rain,
And rudely trample down the slain,
'Twill give you finer footing!

Fall backwards—now the failure's o'er,
And linger on the bloody shore.
As if within your heads;
Wait calmly in the evening air,
While grape and galling bullet tear
Around your honored heads!

Stand in the blue fire's ghastly light—
The mud shall be your bed to-night;
Then plunge and choking sink:
No boats to bear you through the storm,
To doctors and to chloroform!
We mark your fate and think.

All sacred to Moloch's might,
In useless, ill-conducted fight,
There let them fall and sleep;
They yield a crop of K. O. B.'s,
Although across the rolling seas
Some gentle eyes may weep.

Now sound the requiem through the fleet;
The mud is all their winding sheet,
Their lullaby the wave!
While rude Mongolians boast around,
O'er all the wide celestial ground,
How good the foreign devils found
A bullet-furrowed grave.

They sleep with many thousands more—
By Balava's rock built shore,
On wind-swept Inukmann;
And with the nobles of the brave,
Who found a sun-steeped Indian grave
In further Hindostan.

Brave soldiers! Never country bred
Her sons more free from craven dread,
Who calmer dare to stand;
And gaze into the eyes of Death,
Or murmur, with their parting breath,
The war-cry of their land.

The following is Horace Greeley's closing letter, written from California during his late tour, and contains the summing up of his opinions in regard to the State, its inhabitants, prospects; etc. The letter is an interesting one and will repay a perusal:

An Overland Journey.

XXXIII.
Sept. 4-5, 1859.

The entire area of this State is officially estimated as containing a fraction less than one hundred millions of acres; but, as this total includes bays as well as lakes, rivers, &c., the actual extent of unsubmerged land can hardly exceed ninety millions of acres, or rather more than nine times the area of New Hampshire or Vermont—perhaps twice the area of New York. It is only a guess on my part, but one founded on considerable travel and observation, which makes not more than one-third of this extent—say thirty millions of acres—properly arable; the residue being either ruggedly mountainous, hopelessly desert, or absorbed in the tule marshes which line the San Joaquin and perhaps some other rivers. The arable thirty millions of acres—nearly the area of all New England except Maine—are scarcely equalled in capacity of production by any like area on earth. They embrace the best vinelands on this continent, to an extent of many millions of acres—an area capable of producing all the

Wine and all the Raisins annually consumed on the globe. All the fruits of the temperate zone are grown here in great luxuriance and perfection, together with the Fig, Olive, &c., to which the Lemon and Orange may be added in the South. No other land on earth produces Wheat, Rye, and Barley so largely with so little labor as the great majority of these thirty million acres; a portion of them are well adapted also to Indian Corn. To stock growing in an easy, slovenly, reckless way, this mild climate and fertile soil also lend themselves readily; yet I must believe that many more acres are required here to graze a thousand head of cattle than in New York or Kentucky, and that the capacities of California to furnish beef and milk in this poor fashion have been taxed very nearly to the utmost. Doubtless, four, six, or even ten times the present number of cattle will be fed here at some future day, but not wholly on the spontaneous growth of the valleys and hillsides. Nay: I hear already that, as the Wild Oats and natural grasses are closely fed year after year, so as to preclude their seeding or prevent the seed falling to the earth and germinating, they gradually die out, and are supplanted by coarse, worthless weeds. Evidently—and I rejoice over the fact—the day of ranches, or broad, unfenced domains, over which the cattle of the owner range at will, protected only by his brand from indiscriminate appropriation, is passing away for ever. And it is high time. Though the range is yet many acres per head, and the feed ample for the greater part of the year, yet the cows of California give less milk to-day than a like number kept for milk on any other portion of the globe. The dry grass and stubble on which they subsist keep them in fair flesh, but furnish scanty surplus for butter and cheese. Good butter is worth fifty cents and over per pound, and has generally at this season a white insipid look, like that made in Winter at the East. Cheese commands twenty-five cents per pound, and is seldom seen on hotel or private tables. Yet the production, though meager, is rapidly increasing; the little valleys opening directly on the Pacific, and thus kept green by its fogs and damp winds, in spite of the six months' absence of rain, yielding it most abundantly. A cheese weighing seven hundred and fifty pounds, the product of a single dairy, is now here, on its way to the State Fair at Sacramento; the large store in which I saw it is full of California-made cheese, from basement to attic. Yet California does not nearly supply her own wants, whether of cheese or butter, and never will until her dairymen shall deem it profitable to shelter their stock in Winter and supply them with green fodder in later Summer and Fall. Whenever they shall generally devote one quarter of their lands to growing Chilian Clover, Sowed Corn, Beets, Parsnips and Carrots, wherewith to feed their cows, from August to February, they will make twice or thrice their present product of butter and cheese, and prove theirs one of the best dairy regions on earth. But habits, especially bad ones, are stubborn things, and they will only come to this wisdom by degrees.

Whether California would be a better country if it had rain in Summer, I have already somewhat considered. That it would be more inviting and attractive in aspect, especially to those unaccustomed to such sterility through the latter half of each year, cannot be doubted. With such rain, its natural pasturage would suffice for twice its present number of cattle, while cultivation could be extended far up into the mountains, on lands now deemed arable only when irrigated. Yet, on the other hand, these dry summers have their advantages. By their aid, the most bountiful harvests of hay and grain are secured in the best order, and by means of the least possible labor. Weeds are not half so inveterate and troublesome here as in rainy countries. A given amount of labor accomplishes far more in any direction than at the East. The wise man may start on a journey, of business or pleasure, without consulting his barometer, and the fool without looking into his almanac. Nobody, save in winter or early spring, ever casts an apprehensive look at the skies; it may be cloudy or foggy, as it often is; but you know it cannot rain till next November, and lay your plans accordingly. I have passed large fields of standing wheat that have been dead ripe for at least a month; they will shell some when cut, but the grain will be bright and plump as ever. All through the grain region, you see wheat that has been thrashed and sacked, and piled up in the open field where it grew, to await the farmer's convenience in taking it to market; and it may lie so for months without damage, unless from squirrels or gophers. Wheat is sown throughout the winter, though the earlier sown is the surer. Plowing commences with the rains, and sowing should follow as closely as may be. Very decent crops of "volunteer" grain are often grown, by simply harrowing in the seed shelled out and lost in the process of harvesting—sometimes even though the harrowing is omitted. But the ground squirrels are apt to intercept this process by filling the grain fields with their holes, and eating up all the scattered grain and a good deal more. They are a great pest in many localities, and strychnine is freely and effectively employed to diminish their numbers.

I have estimated that barely one-third of the total area of unsubmerged California is perfectly arable, but it would be a great mistake to suppose the residue worthless. At least thirty millions of acres more are covered by rugged hills and mountain, mainly timbered—much of the timber being large and of the best quality. Yellow, Pitch and Sugar Pine—the Pitch Pine being scarcely akin to its stunted and scrubby New England namesake, but a tall and valuable tree—the Sugar being nearly identical with our white Pine, save that its sap is, saccharine.—White Cedar, Redwood, Spruce, Balsam Fir—all these averaging at least twice the size of the trees in any forest I ever saw elsewhere, while the Balsam is just the most shapely and graceful tree on earth—such are the forests which cover all but the snowy peaks of the mountains of California. Trees six to eight feet through are as common in the Sierra Nevada, and I hear in the Coast Range also, as those three to four feet in diameter are (or were) in the pine forests of New York and New England. Consider that these giants look down on the gold mines wherein a very large proportion of the most active population of this State must for ages be employed, while the agricultural districts lie just below them, and even the seaboard cities are but a day's ride further, and the value of these forests becomes apparent. The day is not distant—there are those living who will see it—when what is now California will have a population of three to six millions; then eligible timber lands in the Sierra will be worth more per acre than would now be paid for farms in the richest valleys near San Francisco.

The timber of the lower hills and plains is generally Oak—short bodied, wide-spreading, and of poor quality, save for fuel, being brash, (easily broken, like a clay pipe stem) and not durable. The more common variety looks like the White Oak found in New England pastures, but resembles it in looks only. Live Oak is next in abundance, and also a poor article. It has a smooth, dark bark, a short, crooked trunk, a profusion of good-for-nothing limbs, and small deep green leaves, which defy the frosts of winter. The trunk is often barked by Vandals for tanning, leaving the tree standing alive, but certain to die. Black and Rock Oak are found in some of the mountain valleys; and seem to be of fair quality. Large Cottonwood and Sycamore line some of the streams, but very sparingly. Her Evergreens are the pride of California.

The gold mines are generally found among the foot-hills of the Sierra, or in the beds of the streams which traverse those hills. In many instances, hills now tower where rivers once ran—how long since, who may tell? Trees in a state of semi-petrification are dug out from under hundreds of feet of solid earth, which seems to have lain undisturbed since creation. The beds of ancient lakes are

Of course, I do not think that the gold mines of California will ever be thoroughly worked out—certainly not in the next thousand years; yet I do not anticipate any considerable increase in their annual production, because I deem $50,000,000 per annum as much as can be taken out at a profit under existing circumstances. The early miners of California reaped what nature had been quietly sowing thro' countless thousands of years. Through the action of frost and fire, growth and decay, air and water, she had been slowly wearing down the primitive rocks in which the gold was originally deposited, washing away the lighter matter, and concentrating the gold thus gleaned from cubic miles of stubborn quartz and granite in a few cubic feet of earth at the bottom of her water courses. Many a miner has thus taken out in a day gold which could not have been extracted from the rock where it first grew in many weeks. Even the hills in which it is now mainly found can be washed down at one dollar or less per cubic yard by the best hydraulic appliances. But when the miner is brought face to face with the rough granite, which he must drill and blast and tunnel for all the gold he gets, the case is bravely altered. He may make money here; he sometimes does; but I am sure that, up to this hour, not one quartz-mining enterprise in every four has paid its bare expenses; and, tho' there will be brilliant exceptions, I am confident that quartz mining, as a whole, will not pay for many years to come. Either labor must be cheaper, or the process of quartz-mining far more economical and efficient, or the yield per ton much greater, before one undeniably auriferous quartz-vein in ten will pay the cost of working it. And, while I presume improvements will from time to time be made, I hear doubtfully the talk of sanguine inventors and operators of doubling the product of gold by this or that new amalgamator or other device. So many of these contrivances have proved futile or of little worth, that I wait.—Chemical tests prove that but a portion of the gold actually contained in the vein-stone (especially if a sulphuret) is now obtained by the crushing and washing process; but how soon or by what process this proportion may be increased I do not know—who does? And until it shall be, I must consider quartz-mining, with labor at the present rates, the poorest business now prosecuted in California. A few, who have struck pockets rather than veins of peculiarly rich quartz, are making a good thing of it, and their luck is in every one's mouth; but of the hundreds who drive up long adits, through dead rock, or sink costly shafts to strike a vein at the best point, and then, after all, too poor to pay for working, little is said or thought till they drop into the gulf of acknowledged bankruptcy and pass away. I believe fewer quartz-veins are being worked to-day than were some years ago; I think fewer still will be worked a year hence, and thenceforward, until cheaper labor or more effective processes shall have rendered quartz-mining a very different business. And until such change is effected, I apprehend that the annual gold product of California will not be essentially augmented.

POPULATION—EDUCATION—MORALS.

The total population of Upper California (our California in contradistinction to the peninsula still held by Mexico,) was estimated, on the 1st of January, 1849, at 26,000: viz: natives of the country (not including Indian,) 13,000; U. S. Americans; 8,000; Europeans, 5,000. The aborigines were estimated, in 1856, by Col. Henley, Superintendent of Indian Affairs, at 65,000. I believe this a gross exaggeration. Six Indian reservations have been officially established in different sections of the State, on which all the Indians have been gathered that could be, and these amount to barely 17,205, according to the official returns, which, being the basis of requisitions on the Government, are certainly not to fall below the truth. I do not believe there are so many more Indians in the State; and, whatever may be the number, it is steadily and rapidly diminishing. These Indians are generally idle and depraved, while the white men who come in contact with them are often rascals and ruffians, who hold that Indians have "no rights which white men are bound to respect." By these, the poor savages are intruded upon, hunted, abused, robbed, outraged, until they are themselves driven to acts of violence, when a "war" ensues, and they are butchered without mercy. If an honest census of the various tribes and bands be taken in 1860, their number will not be found to much exceed 30,000, which 1870 will find reduced to 10,000. The native or Spanish Californians are already reduced in number since 1849, and are now mainly confined to the southern agricultural counties. I have not seen half a dozen of them in a month's travel through the heart of the State.

The census of 1850 made the total population of California (Indians not counted) 92,697, but there were some counties from which no returns were received, which, it was estimated, would increase the aggregate to 117,538. Only two years thereafter, a State census was taken, which increased the number to 264,435—it having more than doubled (by immigration) in two years. Of this number, only 22,193 were females—less than one-tenth of the whole; while the great majority were men in the vigorous prime of life. The state of public morals among a population so disproportioned, in a land far removed from the restraining influences of home and kindred, were better imagined than described.

To-day, the total population of the Golden State (excluding Indians) is probably not less than half a million: the census of 1860 will doubtless give a still larger aggregate. Of these, I judge that some 60,000 are Chinese, with about an equal number of Europeans or Mexicans, not including those who by treaty or naturalization have become American citizens. Of the half million, probably 75,000 are under 18 years of age, while por-

haps an equal number of gamblers and girls over 18, though this would leave 350,000, the prime of life—vigorous, enterprising and industrious—are idlers and drones here; but there probably before a community of half a million people capable of doing work in a year as this poor California. The facts mine gold to the extent of millions of dollars annually, ing four millions of bushels five millions of bushels with large amounts of oil and an ample supply of and fruits for home consumption would go far toward estate point. But the industry nia produces important re, are not exhibited above. The Union is making n strides in building, fencing, farms, setting fruit trees, stock, &c. received, and insert in our paper, a report made by the grand second judicial district of the valley, to the Hon. John C. Ragsdale of that district, during the court held by him in the valley. This document well deserves attention and attention, as the report is a source of information, as from the well known and complaints which in language forcible and distinct, the time temperate and thing like threat in the all the grievances complained of. The report, with the unanimous sentiment of the inhabitants of Carson Valley, is entitled to the early consideration of Congress, has the power of affording aid. The people of the valley, without doubt, experienced a sense of being so far from the seat of government, but perhaps the inconvenience from this cause have been, or even as great as they have been in the nearer the "Mormon Theocracy," spoken of in the address, as "being without a seat of government, and the jurisdiction of the valley, of a people living under a government without any. In the framing of laws for the valley, of personal liberty and note from the seat of government without the presence of a tribunal for the administration of justice; yet, maintaining our Constitution, and promoting prosperity and wealth of the valley, after all, perhaps, not hardships that might have, if the evils complained of, and the people of Carson exempt, by reason of the seat of government, injustice and oppression of the "theocratic hierarchy," retrograde Utah, upon the seat of power, and who to lift a voice against it, living without a fixed law, courts for the administration of justice, but not so great as where both laws and courts are framed to oppress a party and where every appliance, legal, that ingenuity can devise, is resorted to for the purpose of resistance intolerable to such claim the rights which are everywhere else possible fact that greater hardships suffered by others, as shown why those complained of in Carson Valley removed; and the great number of inhabitants now in Carson, which must quickly be a recent discovery of minerals, the growing importance of the valley in consequence of the necessity of a local government, and the reasons urged, and independent organization, undoubtedly, lead to the organization upon the eastern Nevada an embryo in time, may rival in wealth and power which lies beyond those of the El Dorado fabled by has not only enriched the valley, but to change in time of its commerce.

Before these things, the superstition, and the degenerating vices, and have characterized the Territory must give way, or he will be compelled to abandon the country—which is a remedy to be desired by the people of the nation than even the application of the people of the valley in the mean time, meet, as well for the advantage, most result to themselves as for the furtherance and promotion of the common welfare which their successful application must contribute in producing.

THE NEWS.

The California mail arrived regularly on Thursday last. The news is not important: Judge Henry P. Haven, of Yuba county, has been appointed U. S. Senator to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Senator Broderick.

The previous report of the discovery of gold and silver in Carson Valley is fully confirmed, and the California papers devote a good deal of their space to descriptions of the new mines, and an account of their richness. They also state that an extensive emigration had already commenced towards Carson Valley and the new mines. The accounts from the mines are altogether encouraging, if not fabulous. Forty and fifty thousand dollars have in some instances been offered and refused for single mining claims.

The Eastern Mail arrived yesterday evening when our paper was nearly ready for the press. We have in consequence had time to look into only a few of our exchanges. The event of greatest interest which we were enabled from a hasty glance to notice in them, was an account of a treasonable and most reckless and fanatical attempt of a party of nineteen men headed by a certain John Brown, better known as "Oswatimie Brown," to raise an insurrection among the slaves of Virginia. Harper's Ferry was the point selected for this "philanthropic movement," as Brown was fond of terming it, and though the attempt signally failed in the main object of inciting the negroes to insurrection, not a single one, having joined the insurrectionary leaders, it nevertheless continued long enough to result in the death of over fifteen or sixteen of the insurrectionists and in the loss of several citizens endeavoring to dislodge the insurgents from the fire engine house connected with the army, in which they had taken refuge, or rather taken possession of, for the purpose of resisting any attack which might be made upon them. Two of Brown's sons were killed and old Brown himself, received several wounds, but none of them are believed to be mortal. He was doubtless preserved for a different and more conspicuous death, which he certainly deserves. The plans of Brown and the conspirators connected with him were the most visionary and foolish imaginable, and remind us only of the hair-brained exploits of the famed knight of La Mance, from which it differs only in the effusion of blood which resulted.

Brown, ever since his arrest, seems to regard himself as every inch a hero, who undertook to do something great and meritorious. He speaks of his sons as having perished in a glorious cause, and, in all respects, talks and acts like an insane fanatic, which he no doubt is. But there is quite too much "method in his madness" for him to escape from the consequences into which it has led him. His movement, with the terrible consequences which resulted, are the natural fruits of that spirit of aggression and fanaticism, which long and continued agitation on the subject of slavery has engendered in the minds of many northern men, and not until that agitation ceases, can it be hoped that the reckless folly which Brown and his party evinced in this movement on Harper's Ferry will not in some form display itself in acts of equal lawlessness and crime.

Brown and the other conspirators who were not killed, have since been placed on trial at Charlestown and one or two of them convicted, but none of them have been sentenced as far as we have seen, and it is thought in some quarters that Gov. Wise will commute their punishment to imprisonment for life in case they are found guilty of murder and sentenced to death.

Extensive election riots for which Baltimore has acquired such disgraceful notoriety, again took place in that city during a recent election there for state officers, several persons were killed and a large number bruised and wounded.

From a telegraphic dispatch from Atchafalpa, of Oct. 31st, to the St. Louis Republican, we see that Hon. John Hartnett and party, arrived at that place on the Saturday previous to the date of the dispatch; they were thus over forty days in making the trip across the plains.

Some of the California papers are disputing about the fact whether the late D. C. Broderick approved the course and principles of Mr. Douglas or not, and one paper declares in big capitals, that Mr. Broderick "UTTERLY DESPISED DOUGLAS." Would it not be well, gentlemen, to postpone the discussion and avoid the bile which it engenders, till it can be ascertained whether Mr. Broderick's opinions on this matter, are of any moment either to Mr. Douglas or any body else in the world?

The Placerville Observer has a sensibly written article on the subject of the different mail lines across the continent, which we insert in our paper. The writer truly remarks, that a tri-weekly mail from Placerville to any railroad terminus in Missouri, could be run profitably for a less amount than is now paid for a semi-weekly upon the southern route. The route known as the central route which passes through this valley, is the one above all others which will subserve more than any other the convenience and necessities of a large number of inhabitants, and of numerous settlements now springing up along its line, of persons who have been attracted hither by the gold mines of Pike's Peak, and the more recent discoveries of the precious minerals in Carson Valley. It is the one also, as remarked by the Observer which is the shortest and has the fewest difficulties to overcome. There certainly appears little reason or good sense in our government, paying six hundred thousand dollars per annum for the transportation of the mails across the continent over a route which is at once longer and more difficult to travel, and along which, there is not, we believe, a single settlement from where it leaves Arkansas till it reaches California, where for the same or perhaps a less sum the same service might be performed over the central route in less time, and be made with the object of convenience and protection to the numerous settlements through which it passed and of emigrants in crossing the plains.

Our government and particularly the present administration, appears to act on the policy of the "circumlocution office" described by Dickens where they seek the most round-about method of accomplishing whatever it undertakes, or of studying how not to do any thing. It is to be hoped, however, that the neglect which has been heretofore shown the central, and the evident partiality of the Administration for other routes of less utility and consequence over it, will, ere long cease, or, if it does not, that necessity will exert what there has not been the justice and fairness hitherto to render—we mean, of course, the establishment of a semi or tri-weekly mail service across the continent, over the central route.

Notice the advertisement of Cannon in our paper for taking pictures of the latest style and best quality. If our readers would reflect but for one moment, "On what slippery ground they tread," they would not neglect the opportunity of preserving to the world, the likeness of their precious and handsome faces. Let them all call therefore, and be done up in the best style of nature and art by M. Cannon.

DEATH OF HON. JOHN Y. MASON.—Our readers will have learned with deep regret, from the announcement made yesterday, by telegraphic head, that the Hon. John Y. Mason, our esteemed Minister at the Court of France, died suddenly in Paris on the 3d inst. The death of Mr. Mason, if not entirely unexpected, will be none the less sensibly felt as a serious loss in the sphere of usefulness which he had latterly filled with so much credit to himself and acceptance to his own government, as also to that near which he was called to reside. It has been the lot of few to occupy official positions more varied and responsible, as few have brought to them a superior ability and dignity.—Nat. Int. Oct. 22.

From a later paper we learn that the remains of Mr. Mason have been brought home for interment.

A pretty serious difficulty seems to be raging between the Hon. Alex. P. Walker, formerly editor of The Cincinnati Enquirer, now editor of The N. O. Delta, and Mr. John P. Heiss, formerly proprietor of The Delta, and now of The States, the Douglas organ in Washington. Heiss says that while he was proprietor of The Delta he dismissed Walker, because he "detected him in selling the columns of our paper to advance the private interests of other parties, for a consideration," which he put in his own pocket. He also caught Walker, as he says, writing for another journal on the other side in politics. Mr. Walker responds with a denial, and with a clever vituperation of Heiss, who, he says, owes all his success to "the size of his fat, the depth of his chest, the muscle of his arms, the taurine brawn of his neck, and prodigious circumference of his head." In the further course of the controversy, charges of forgery, perjury, and swindling are pretty freely exchanged. That's all at present.

A few nights since, as Mr. Chas. Beatty and sister, of Armstrong township, Pa., were returning home from Shelocta, on horseback, they were chased by a panther, which, coming up with them near a run, sprang on the back of Mr. B's horse. The animal plunged violently, and the "varmint," not being able to retain his hold, fell, leaving in the horse's back abundant evidence of the ferocity of the attack. As soon as freed from his assailant, Mr. B. put spurs to his horse, and the girl doing likewise, they were soon beyond reach of his pantherish, who, however, still pursued them.

Lines to one who can understand them.

Dear Laura, all your sewing brings
And set you down beside me here,
And listen while a song I sing
Of other days, and other years.

The old beech tree where first we met
Is standing yet, as firm and true,
As when I swore to ne'er forget
The love which thine I vowed to you.

The friends we loved were round us there,
And music sweet was in our ears,
We dreamed not then, that soon despair
Would turn our loving smiles to tears.

But long and bitter years have flown,
Years of parting, and of sorrow,
The friends we loved, are gone, all gone,
And we, too, may go to-morrow.

Then closer draw unto my side,
No harm shall ere befall you here,
And while I clasp my darling bride,
Forgive me if I shed a tear.

A tear, a bright and hallowed tear,
By sorrow rendered doubly pure,
Again to know my Laura near,
And feel she's mine forever more.

Present condition of the Mexican Negotiations.

Letter-writers for the Eastern press have so completely muddled the subject of our Mexican relations, by their contrivance of statements, that no reader, unless he has examined the case with the care of a lawyer consulting his brief, can have any idea of the present relative position of the governments of the United States and her sister republic at this time. Whether Mr. McLane has concluded a treaty or not, and if not, what is the difficulty in the way of effecting that result, are points upon which scarce any ordinarily well-informed man could give a definite answer if questioned. After delving for some hours in this diplomatic chaos, we find the following, apparently to be the vital facts to be elicited therefrom.

Minister McLane, as our readers already know, returned from Mexico early in the month of September. He did not bring a treaty with him, as was erroneously reported at the time, the Juárez government having declined to accept the draft of a convention sent out to our minister from Washington, and which he was instructed to press with all his power. I appear that the Liberal Government was quite content with all the stipulations of the proposed treaty, except one conceding to the United States the privilege of landing U. S. troops on Mexican territory, if necessary, to protect the transit routes opened to American capital, enterprise and travel. It was claimed by the Mexican government that a provision of this character infringed the sovereignty and reflected upon the dignity, power or good faith of Mexico. Juárez declared that it would be useless on his part to make such a treaty stipulation, as Congress would be sure to reject it. The fact is, doubtless, that Juárez has some natural misgivings as to the propriety of letting American troops take possession of Mexican soil foreseeing that the occasion might readily be availed of for practical conquest, whenever the United States Government should choose to have it so.

But the Liberal Government evidenced the fact that its objection was not capricious, by declaring its willingness to accept the objectionable clause, with the proviso that the American troops were only to be landed in the event of their being required to do so by the Government of Mexico. This Mr. McLane declined to accept, and there the negotiation ended. All the other points demanded by our Government were conceded, the proposition for a cession of Mexican territory having been abandoned, at last, by Mr. Buchanan, in his latest instructions to Mr. McLane. It certainly was blundering diplomacy which permitted an opportunity to secure so much to pass unimproved. Especially does this appear, when we find how far the Government of Mexico was prepared to go in order to meet our views in the matter of adequate protection to the transit routes.

Mr. McLane urged in favor of the unrestricted privilege of landing troops, that should any difficulty occur on the transits, and the Mexican forces fail for any reason to restore quiet, there would be no time to consult the government and obtain its permission to land troops. In illustration of the necessity that might arise for prompt action, the case of the Panama riot was referred to, in which many American lives were lost, and many shameful robberies were committed by the troops of New Granada, whose government was bound by solemn treaty stipulation to secure safe transit for the passengers and mails from the United States. The Mexican Government proposed to obviate the difficulty by the appointment of commissioners to reside on the transits—especially on the Isthmus of Tehuantepec—to give notice of any apprehended difficulty, and take measures for its repression, and also in the event that the native force failed to afford all needed protection, to call upon the American troops for the required aid. To guard against the possible event of the commissioners abusing their positions, and falling, from hostility to the transit company, to interfere when necessary, Mexico proposed that the U. S. States should also appoint a resident commissioner, whose duty it would be to notify the Mexican authorities of the need of protection at any time, and to call upon the United States forces to interpose if the Mexican protection was not promptly afforded. All this, however, was declined by Mr. McLane, whose instructions seem to have left him without discretion, and a mere puppet in the hands of the Presidential wire-puller at Washington.

Thus the matter stands at present—or did at last accounts. It is supposed that if Mr. Buchanan decides to yield the point in regard to landing troops, the negotiation can be promptly renewed at Washington, and conducted to an otherwise satisfactory conclusion. Let us hope that he will have sense enough to embrace the opportunity. If we settle a Mexico, something will have been gained, and the good relations thus commenced will make it easier to obtain whatever else is demanded by justice and sound policy, upon some future occasion. If it is the policy of the United States to encourage the establishment of the Juárez government in Mexico, we ought not insist upon cession of territory, or any other act that would tend to excite popular feeling against the Liberal party. The disintegration of Mexican territory would assuredly prove the downfall of any Mexican administration assenting to it; and the landing of foreign troops would be regarded with nearly equal dissatisfaction. If we were prepared, by exertion of the strong hand, to force either or both these points upon Mexico, we might carry them; but to expect the Liberal government to yield up peacefully these incidents of conquest, and retain its power to preserve good relations between ourselves and Mexico, or to sustain itself at all, is utterly and absurdly idle.

N. P. Banks, who, on the 19th September, was unanimously nominated by the Republican Convention, of Massachusetts for re-election to the Governorship, is looming up as a Presidential candidate. We learn by private letter, from a well-informed party, that the ex-Speaker has high hopes of receiving the nomination, for which he will probably be supported by all the New England delegates to the Convention. Mr. Sewall is very popular in the Eastern States, but it is claimed that he is only their second choice while Banks is in the field.

The subject of the organization of the next House of Representatives begins to attract considerable attention. Although the Democracy will be decidedly in the minority in the new House, the Republicans have not a majority—the "Americans" from the South holding the balance of power. Under these circumstances, it is probable that another three-cornered fight will occur, similar to that which resulted in the election of Mr. Banks to the Speakership of the 34th Congress, by a plurality vote. The experience of that occasion, doubtless, indicates the policy to be now pursued. The Republicans need only a few votes to command success. These, we take it for granted, will be secured from among the "Americans" in behalf of a resolution directing an election of Speaker by plurality vote; and that having been effected, the Republican candidate will be chosen.

Among the several gentlemen talked of as the Republican candidate for Speaker, John Sherman, of Ohio, seems to stand foremost. Mr. Sherman is a gentleman of decided ability, great dignity and force of character, and very popular with all who admire a public man of modest demeanor but inflexible will, sterling integrity and a careful regard of the rights, and respect for the views of all who differ with him. A better selection for presiding officer of the House could not be made. It will be remembered that he was a member of the celebrated Congressional Committee sent to Kansas to investigate the troubles in that Territory between the Pro-Slavery and Free State men. In consequence of the ill health of Mr. Howard, of Michigan, (the Chairman of that Committee,) the greater part of its active labors devolved upon Mr. Sherman; and the zeal and fidelity which he displayed in the discharge of the arduous and delicate duties then devolving upon him, won him the gratitude of all the Republicans, as well as of the lovers of fair dealing, and opponents of election frauds of every party faith.

For clerk of the House, there are also several candidates, among whom may be named Col. John W. Forney, Editor of the Philadelphia Press, (Douglas Democrat,) Col. Schouler, (Republican,) editor of the Boston Atlas and Bee, J. C. McKibbin, (Douglas Democrat,) ex-M. C. from California, George Harrington, of Georgia, (an admirer and confidant of Mr. Seward,) formerly Chief Clerk of the Treasury Department, under Mr. Corwin, and General Cullom, of Tennessee, Clerk of the House during the 34th Congress. If the Southern Americans aid the Republicans to elect their Speaker, they will, of course, be allowed to claim the Clerk—in which event either Cullom or Harrington's chances are decidedly good, unless some new man steps in to beat the field.

The organization of the next House is a matter of large importance in connection with the Presidential campaign, as its control secures to the party having it the appointment of the Standing Committees, who shape the business of Congress to a great extent, and thus render invaluable assistance in making points for the campaign. In this view, the organization of Congress at the approaching session becomes a matter of more than ordinary importance. The chances are that a month will be wasted in efforts to elect before that end is accomplished.—San Francisco Bulletin.

The Bangor Times states that recently a divorce suit was tried at Houlton, in which Mrs. Coolbroth, daughter of Levi Berry, Esq. of Snyrna, was libelous, who sought a separation from her husband on the ground of his drunkenness and cruelty. The libelous allegations in defense, improper conduct on the part of his wife, but without substantiating the same to the satisfaction of the jury. Mrs. Berry was present during trial, but went home before the verdict was rendered, which, however, she learned by the return of her daughters. Although the verdict was in favor of her daughter, she was so deeply wrought upon by the trial and circumstances of the case, as is supposed that she committed suicide by drowning herself in a brook near the house.

[From the San Francisco Bulletin.]
Rapid Growth of San Francisco.

On all sides may be observed the evidences of prosperity and rapid extension of our city. The number of permanent improvements erected during the past eight months, as well as the confidence sufficiently indicate this. Perhaps could be added that the following fact derived from the Tax office, in the year 1859, the assessment of San Francisco, about 300 pages. At that time the city consisted of a small footsack volume of 100-odd lots had not been enumerated. Now, in 1859, it requires, for the same purpose, ten super-royal folio volumes, of which seven contain the names of the owners, description of the property, the amount of the assessments, and the taxes extended. One volume comprises an alphabetical index of between 8,000 and 9,000 names of owners, and two others contain the block maps, which give, in the most minute and precise dimensions, a diagram of every piece or parcel of land within the city and county. These, together with a score of field-books, aggregate upwards of 10,000 manuscript pages. The city is a cotemporary journal, (the San Francisco Press,) recently visited San Francisco, and, in the following felicitous speech of condensation, it describes it.

"There is now here a city whose limits embrace about 2,000 acres of land, traversed by nearly four hundred streets; inhabited by about 70,000 souls; paying taxes on property assessed at about $35,000,000; supporting 28 public schools, 35 cents on each $100 of property valuation, besides maintaining many private schools and colleges, dispensing the public charities through the medium of nearly 50 benevolent societies of various kinds; containing upwards of 40 churches devoted to religious, literary, commercial, protective, social and musical objects, besides some 50 incorporated companies; boasting 38 church edifices and congregations, protected by a fire department of nearly 800 members; a system of public water works; issuing 30 different newspapers and periodicals, publications, some of which have no superiors anywhere; already manufacturing largely, the foundries, machine shops, etc., alone amounting to 200 and employing about 1,000 persons; having its public hospitals, its military organizations, its numerous insurance agencies, its artists, its orators, its eminent lawyers, merchant princes, its elegant public and private buildings, its lines of stages and steamboats, its ocean steamers, and a ten thousand things that make up a great metropolis."

In addition to all this, we can truly add, that San Francisco is now one of the best governed cities in the Union.

George Riggs of London, lately deceased, in his will does not fail to remember the printers with whom his business was so intimately connected. His property was valued at $70,000, of which he leaves $12,000 to his wife, $11,000 to other parties, and a considerable number of small legacies to his assistants and the contributors to the Family Herald, published by him. He bequeaths $200 to the Printers' Pension Society; to the Printers' Widow and Orphan Fund, $100; to the Printers' Almshouse Fund, $100; beside $100 each to the Servants, Home and Dressmakers' Institution, and a like amount to several hospitals. After these legacies are all paid, he bequeaths the residue of his property to the Printers' Almshouse Society, to be divided among the aged printers and widows of printers.

SILVER ORE ROUTE.—Several loads of silver ore from Carson Valley passed through this place yesterday. We judge from appearances that it was very rich, if weight is an indication. A number of small boxes covering the bottom of the wagon bed, seemed a good load, a six mule team.

We are told that, in a short time, works will be constructed near the city, that will obviate the necessity of sending the rock below.—Placerville Observer.

Edward Everett has contributed over $66,000 to the purchase of Mount Vernon. His Washington ordinance has delivered 130 times, in different parts of the Union, yielding about $56,000. His Mount Vernon papers in the N. Y. Ledger, $10,000 more. He has traveled many thousand miles, paying his own expenses, and paying the proceeds of his lectures to the Mount Vernon fund.

The Hon. Edward Everett has accepted an invitation to deliver an address at the Georgia State Fair to be held at Atlanta from the 24th to the 28th of October.

The Sunday car question has taken a new direction in Pittsburgh. Heretofore it has been a car question, pure and simple; it is now becoming mixed up with affidavits, and no less than thirteen affidavits were made on Sunday, at Mayor's office in Pittsburgh, with a different citizen, charging them with their carriages to be driven through the streets. Among these complained of, the name of the Chief Justice of the State appears.

Two young men of Newport, R. I., are said to have recently tested the fidelity of their rival claims to the hand of the same young lady, by an appeal to their muscles. The preliminaries were all arranged and they met by moonlight, (lovers' favorite luminary, we are told,) and, stripped to the buff, fought to a standstill. They then drew off to rest, and recovered with no less vigor, and accomplished their pitched battle, until one of them, named Ladd, was proclaimed Victor.

As noos are said to speak with their tails, would it be proper to call a short-tail dog a stump orator.

REPORT

Grand Jury of the Second District of Utah Territory, September Term, 1889.

Hon. J. C. CRADLEBAUGH, undersigned, Grand Jurors, appointed for the September Term of the U. S. District Court, for the Judicial District of Utah Territory, respectfully submit this for the consideration of the court.

The accumulation of offenses, in the absence of all recognized judicial tribunals, have imposed upon the community an amount of labor which has been impossible entirely to obviate. The instructions of the Court, therefore, exercised a discretion in the selection of those of which, in our judgments, were the most important and demanded immediate investigation, and refer our un-derstanding business for the consideration of future Grand Juries.

We cannot permit the present occasion to pass, and would leave our imperfectly performed, were it to adjourn without congratulating citizens of this judicial district, the successful organization of a tribunal, that already commands the hearty sympathy and engagement of every patriotic citizen. Hitherto we have presented singular anomalies, without a parallel beyond the jurisdiction of the United States, of a people living under a constitutional government with any participation in the framing laws for the protection of person and property, remote from seat of government and without presence of courts or other tribunals for the administration of justice, yet, maintaining our loyalty to constitution, supporting the laws and promoting the prosperity and well-being of the country. We can, therefore, with special pride and propriety, congratulate the citizens of this district upon such an auspicious event in our midst, as the organization of a court of justice for the immediate protection of the flag of our Union, that will insure perfect and peaceful enjoyment of every citizen in his personal liberty and right of property. In the past, this congratulation there was serious causes of public and private grievances, which urgently call for redress, and to which we respectfully call attention.

MORMON THEOCRACY. First in importance, is the social condition of antagonism that distinguishes the citizens of this Territory, and creates an irreconcilable political animosity between them. Our community is divided into two classes—those who receive and practice the tenets of the Orthodox, Catholic and Protestant Churches, and those who hold to the Mormon faith. All political power, the legislature and the Territorial offices, are and have been under the control and disposal of the Mormon people. The political power of the Territory may justly be said, therefore, to have been in the past, a pure theocracy.

The gentiles, so called, (those apart from the Mormon Church,) have been allowed no political power, and exercised no influence upon the legislature; and instead protection have only found abuse and oppression in the laws enacted by the Mormon legislature. The Mormon population far exceeds that of other citizens, they reside near the seat of government, and possess every ability to perpetuate by force and fraud their present Theocratic Tyranny. This condition of things, socially and politically, so oppressive to the people of this district, loudly demands redress, and is a rebuke to our nation, of equal laws and equal liberty.

JUDICIAL TRIBUNALS. Another grievance of paramount importance, and which has greatly retarded the rapid settlement and improvement of this district, is the absence of regular terms of the district court, and the uniform of administration of justice. For three long and dreary years we have been without any court of justice; the law has been a nullity for want of an administrative tribunal; and the people without compass or star, have groped along the path of civilization and empire, conquering the wilderness and increasing the substantial wealth of the nation; guided alone by their loyalty to the Union and sustained by the long deferred hope that their repeated petitions would eventually be heard, and their grievances redressed by the paternal government.

The seat of justice in this district is seven hundred miles from the capital of the Territory, the distance is aggravated by difficult and rugged mountains and great barren deserts, stretching from 114 to 122 miles of longitude. This district is one-third of the entire Territory; hence the right of appeal is a constitutional illusion, and with the presence of a permanent court, substantial justice in many instances can only be attained at the cost of personal impoverishment. These, apart from other detailed reasons should suggest to the serious consideration of Congress amelioration through an amendment to our judicial system.

INDIAN AFFAIRS. Another grievance of vast importance is the condition of the Indians, and the absence of adequate military defense for the immigrants, and citizens within the Territory. While ample appropriations have been made by the Government for the subjugation and support of the Indians in the entire Territory, the confidence of Congress has been shamefully abused, and the bounty has been basely squandered, without securing any of the aims and objects of the appropriations. Two thirds of the Indian population reside within this district; they live along the immigrant route; are far more hostile than their more eastern brethren and are constantly outraging property, harassing the settlements and murdering our citizens.

Yet, almost the entire amount of the appropriations hitherto made by Congress has been exhausted in abortive attempts to make reservations, and to conciliate the Indians about Salt Lake, who are already subsidized by the Mormon Church and influence; while this is the case, there has not been a solitary military station established in this district, and scarcely a dollar expended among our Indian tribes. The people in winter, have to support the Indians from charity to prevent starving; and in the summer, have had to do so from necessity, to purchase protection to life and property. At all seasons, citizens passing through, and immigrants to the Territory, are compelled to run a gauntlet through savage and inhuman enemies, ready and seeking to destroy life and property. National reputation and prosperity seem to suggest that for this district there should be created a separate Indian Agency, with an independent appropriation, and that sufficient military stations should be established along the usual line of travel.

BOUNDARY SURVEY. As a subject of equal importance, we cannot over estimate the vexed question of Territorial jurisdiction, growing out of the disputed boundary between the State of California and this Territory. This matter has been and still is the fruitful source of annoyance and dispute. There is a large extent of territory bordering upon the eastern boundary of California, rich in population, mineral and agricultural wealth, over which up to the present time, there has been exercised no recognized local authority.

For this reason, criminals, charged with grave offenses have escaped conviction; crime has been boldly committed without fear of accusation, and valuable property has remained without assessment and taxation. It is not less important to the peace of our community, than for the preservation of friendly relations between the State of California and this Territory, that Congress should create a commission to survey and establish a boundary line as early as is practicable.

MORMON OUTRAGES. We further make special reference to the following grievances, which are as disgraceful to the age of our country as they are oppressive to us:

The Mormon people are at present bitterly hostile to the government of the United States; are in the constant practice of violating the Organic Act, and commit daily outrages upon the persons and liberty of American citizens.

They make and unmake laws ad libitum, without regard to the Constitution, and commit murder and the highest crimes in defiance of the United States authority, and in contempt of law. They not only disable the federal courts by refusing and neglecting to provide means for the sustenance of the courts, but they trample upon the law, deride the federal judges and resist the executive officers. In their legislation they make purely special laws, and in violation of the Constitution. In their administration of law they screen crime and oppress the right, by disfranchising and murdering individuals, merely for being American citizens. They prostitute their own females and have debauched helpless American women; and with systematic barbarity, have incited the Indian savages to attack and murder large bodies of unprotected people. We might prolong this detail of infamy and crime to the end of the catalogue of offenses did time permit, or if it were necessary to show the necessity of some immediate and adequate protection by Congress.

NEVADA TERRITORY. Whether this security can best be had in the creation of a new territory, or of an independent judicial district, with the right to appeal to the U. S. circuit court of California, we leave to the wiser councils of the paternal government. In view, however, of the dissimilar tastes and interests, and of the discordant sentiments, religious and political, of the people, and of the outrages above enumerated, we submit that the best interests of the government in this Territory imperatively require some remedial legislation on the part of Congress.

RESOURCES. Our vast and fertile plains, our fruitful pastures and teeming herds, the wonderful extent and unparalleled richness of our mines, already surround us with enviable advantages and attract the attention of neighboring communities. Our present prospects are only prophetic of our future prosperity, and our speedy attainment to a high position in the rank of sister States.

Our wealth is not only rapidly increasing with the cultivation of our fields, the increase of our herds and the development of the mines, but it is reasonable to predict that within the next twelve months we will have a population of American citizens sufficient to justify our admission forthwith in the sisterhood of States, and thus complete the chain of civilization, religion and liberty that now reaches from the shores of the Pacific and Atlantic, and endeavors to bind the continent in one unbroken line.

As a subject of local importance, we would suggest the necessity, in the absence of sufficient county organizations, that an appropriation be made for the erection of public buildings, and to pay the Marshal, Clerk and other Territorial Officers.

In conclusion, we express our thanks for the uniform courtesy of the court and its officers, and especially to Wellington Stewart, District Attorney, for his ability and industry in ministering to the performance of our labors.

We respectfully submit the above and ask to be discharged.

Late and Interesting Intelligence from the Washoe Mines.

Mr. F. J. Hughes arrived in this city Oct. 25th, from the new mining region in Washoe valley. He left Virginia town last Saturday morning. Mr. Hughes furnished us a full and interesting description of the new diggings, and the operations now in progress there. His account is tinged with enthusiasm, but after making all due allowance for the excited state of feeling prevalent in the mines, and in which he probably participates, his narrative is well calculated to excite the attention and wonder of our readers.

Mr. Hughes went to Virginia town, the locality of the richest discoveries, in June last, and remained there until the close of last week, so that his opportunities of observation have been ample. The existence of silver in that region was discovered by three men, who were working a good claim in Six-Mile canyon, in June of the present year. Following their surface, diggings, they at length struck the gold lead consisting of a black soil without lustre, so rich that portions of it yielded $80 to the pan. They found a pocket, as it is there called, filled with black metal, from which they made $100 per day with a rocker. A number of Mexican miners from Sonora examined the tailings or refuse dirt, and informed the miners that they were throwing away two dollars of silver for each one of gold that they collected. A company of three or four Mexicans commenced working these "tailings"

About two months ago Judge Walsh took one ton of the black metal in which the silver occurred to San Francisco, in order to procure a reliable assay. The result was from $900 to $5,000 per ton, according to the parts of the mine from which the specimens were taken. It is a remarkable property of this "black metal," that it decomposes and becomes soft from exposure, to such a degree that it can even be crushed between the fingers. The claim had in the meantime been divided into six shares, two to each of the original parties. Comstock sold his for $5,500, and McLaughlin his portion for $5,000. Riley is now the only one of the original parties interested in the lead, and he has refused—so Mr. Hughes says—$40,000 for his share. Judge Walsh owns two-sixths, and is said to have been offered $60,000 for half his interest.

Mr. Hughes has with him a mass of silver mixed with gold, weighing 47 ounces, and valued at $2 per ounce. This bar was obtained from one arroba, or 25 pounds of the tailings before spoken of. Could this be taken as a fair sample of the whole it would indicate the astonishing result of a mass of refuse dirt, from which the gold had been extracted by the ordinary process, worth four dollars to the pound. The ledge in the Comstock claim has two leads of gold and one of silver ore. The gold rock has been proved by the ordinary test to be worth from $5,000 to $2,500 per ton. The silver lead consists of the black metal which is stated to produce $5,000 to the ton, in the proportion of 46 of silver to 4 of gold. The gold leads are from five to nine feet thick, and the dip of the gold bearing rock is about 80 degrees, or nearly perpendicular. The entire ledge is between 15 and 20 feet wide. The silver vein is from 6 to 24 inches wide. The deposits are at Virginia town, which is twenty miles from Carson Valley, 15 from Carson City, and about 160 from Sacramento. There is a ledge of gold rock near Washoe lake which is said to have yielded $2,100 in gold to the ton.

Besides the principal deposit of silver, referred to in Mr. Hughes' narrative, he relates that more than twenty other veins have been opened in the vicinity, and are now in the process of development. It is thought that they extend all the way from Honey Lake to Walker river. The prospectings generally reveal gold on the surface; the silver appears eight or ten feet below. The most magnificent deposit of gold ever discovered, in this continent or in the world, is represented to have been opened at Gold Hill, in a canyon, or rather valley, one and a half miles from Virginia town. The hill is isolated from the mountain spurs, to which it probably once belonged, and is properly a mound about 60 feet high, 5,000 feet long by 2,000 feet wide. It is traversed by veins of auriferous quartz, partly decomposed, yielding from $500 to $2,500 to the ton. This enormous mass of wealth was discovered by a whiskey-drinking character from Virginia, in honor of whom the neighboring village has been named. It is computed that this fortunate person has expended within two months eight or ten thousand dollars in the purchase of his favorite fluid, for the consumption of himself and his friends. This fact is considered interesting, as tending to prove the wealth of the country and the thirst of the inhabitants.

There are now 18 astras in operation at Virginia town, and 8 or 9 at Gold Hill. Many more are in course of erection. Lumber is scarce in the Washoe region; on account of the distance over which it must be drawn, and the incapacity of the mills to supply the demand, suddenly increased as it has been, by the rush of population caused by the opening of the mines. The nearest timber, suitable for lumbering purposes, is fifteen miles from the mines, and the mills, which can be relied upon for a supply, are twenty-five miles distant. The price of lumber at Virginia town is $50 per thousand. The habits of the people are necessarily nomadic and sporadic. They live in tents, as many of them as can secure that accommodation; those who cannot, sleep in haystacks. When meals can be had, they are furnished at the reasonable price of 75 cents each.

About 80 tons of silver has already been sent to San Francisco, or is on the way thither; and Mr. Hughes passed almost 100 teams going out with provisions and general supplies. The price of freight has been raised to 10 cents per pound of $200 per ton from Placerville; but the silver ore is brought this way for half that rate. The rush to the mines is so great, that a daily line has been arranged for. On the day on which he arrived at Placerville, six full stage loads of passengers had been engaged for the next trip.

Mr. Hughes states that ten feet claims are selling at from $2,500 to $3,000 each. He states that the favorite domicile is the wagon; all sleep in these who can get them, and the rest manage as already stated, to sleep in board-shanties, haystacks, tents etc.

Mail Routes.

An increase of service upon the overland mail route to Placerville, is called for by all parties and sections, both of California and the East. The foolish prejudice that has so long existed against this route, is happily giving way to a correct appreciation of its merits. There are now large settlements along it, that require daily or semi-weekly intercourse with each other, or with the States at its extremities. Since the establishment of the overland mails, great changes have taken place. Settlements, however, have not followed the stage lines as we anticipated they would. This, we think, is owing to the general impression among the people, and also among the contractors themselves, of the impropriety of the routes selected, and their want of permanency. Should a line be established by the most direct course through the settlements of the Kansas gold mines, Camp Floyd and Carson Valley, to Placerville, such a confidence in its stability would obtain, that every available spot of ground where a home could be made, would soon be occupied by thrifty farmers, and a chain of settlements would spring up that would become an additional support to such line. A tri-weekly mail from Placerville to any railroad terminus in Missouri, could be run profitably for a less amount than now paid for a semi-weekly upon the southern line. During the past summer a stage for passengers and express has been running from Western Missouri to the Rocky Mountains, without a subsidy from Government; upon this side, a tri-weekly stage line is in successful operation, crossing the Sierra Nevada, receiving only a nominal sum from the P. O. Department; upon this the travel is so great that its necessities require the establishment of a daily line. Thus it will be seen, that upon the Central Route, stage lines are required from place to place, and run with or without the aid of Government; and that the Central is the route best adapted by nature and circumstances for quick, cheap and safe overland communication between the States of the Atlantic and the Pacific. We long since mentioned the route via the Kansas gold mines and Camp Floyd to Carson Valley and Placerville, this being the one now usually referred to as the Central. It is the shortest, passes through the most important settlements, and the best agricultural lands, the most feasible passes in the mountains, avoids the hostile and untamable Indians, and is the route chosen by the people of the Pacific coast as the line of the Pacific Railroad. With all these advantages, a stage line could not fail of success if properly established. —Observer, Placerville, Cal.

A. C. WILSON, Governor of Utah.

of the Grand Jury of the Second District of Utah Territory, September Term, 1899.

Hon. JOHN CRADLEBAUGH:—The undersigned, Grand Jurors, paneled for the September Term of the U. S. District Court, for the Second Judicial District of Utah Territory, respectfully submit this for your report.

The accumulation of offences, in the absence of all recognized judicial tribunals, have imposed upon the jury an amount of labor which has been impossible entirely to perform.

Under the instructions of the Court, we have, therefore, exercised a discretion in the selection of those offences which, in our judgment, were most flagrant and demanded immediate investigation, and refer our unfinished business for the consideration of future Grand Juries.

We cannot permit the present occasion to pass, and would leave our duty imperfectly performed, were we to adjourn without congratulating the citizens of this judicial district upon the successful organization of a judicial tribunal, that already commands the hearty sympathy and encouragement of every patriotic citizen. Hitherto we have presented a singular anomaly, without a parallel beyond the jurisdiction of the United States, of a people living under a constitutional government without any participation in the framing of laws for the protection of personal liberty and property, remote from the seat of government and without the presence of courts or other tribunals for the administration of justice; yet, maintaining our loyalty to the constitution, supporting the laws and promoting the prosperity and wealth of the country.

We can, therefore, with special pride and propriety, congratulate the citizens of this district upon such an auspicious event in our midst, as the organization of a court of justice under the immediate protection of the Flag of our Union, that will insure perfect and peaceful enjoyment to every citizen in his personal liberty and right of property. In the midst of this congratulation, there exists serious causes of public and private grievance, which urgently call for redress, and to which we respectfully call attention.

MORMON TYRANNY.

First in importance, is the social condition of antagonism that distinguishes the citizens of this Territory, and creates an irreconcilable political animosity between them.

Our community is divided into two classes—those who receive and practice the tenets of the Orthodox Catholic and Protestant Churches, and those who hold to the Mormon faith.

All political power, the legislature and the Territorial offices, are, and have hitherto been under the control and disposal of the Mormon Church. The political power of the Territory may justly be said, therefore, to have been in the past a pure Theocracy.

The gentiles, so called, (those apart from the Mormon Church,) have been allowed no political power, have exercised no influence upon the legislature; and instead protection, have only found abuse and oppression in the laws enacted by the local legislature. The Mormon population far exceeds that of other citizens; they reside near the seat of government, and possess every ability to perpetuate by force and fraud their present Theocratic Tyranny. This condition of things, socially and politically, so oppressive to the people of this district, loudly demands redress, and is a rebuke to our national boast of equal laws and equal liberty.

JUDICIAL TRIBUNALS.

Another grievance of paramount importance; and which has greatly retarded the rapid settlement and improvement of this district, is the absence of regular terms of the district court, and the uniform of administration of justice. For three long and dreary years we have been utterly without any court of justice; the law has been a nullity for want of an administrative tribunal; and the people without compass or star, have groped along the path of civilization and empire, conquering the wilderness and increasing the substantial strength of the nation; guided alone by their loyalty to the Union and sustained by the long deferred hope that their repeated petitions would eventually be heard, and their grievances redressed by the paternal Government.

The seat of justice in this district is seven hundred miles from the capitol of the Territory, the distance is aggravated by difficulty and rugged mountains and great barren deserts, stretching from 114 to 122 lines of longitude. This district is one-third of the entire Territory; hence the right of appeal, is a constitutional illusion, and with the presence of a permanent court, substantial justice in many instances can only be attained at the cost of personal impoverishment. These, apart from other detailed reasons should suggest to the serious consideration of Congress amelioration through an amendment to our judicial system.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Another grievance of vast importance is the condition of the Indians, and the absence of adequate military defence for the immigrants, and citizens within the Territory. While ample appropriations have been made by the Government for the subjugation and support of the Indians in the entire Territory, the confidence of Congress has been shamefully abused, and the bounty has been basely squandered, without securing any of the aims and objects of the appropriations. Two thirds of the Indian population reside within this district; they live along the immigrant route; are far more hostile than their more eastern brethren and are constantly outraging property, harassing the settlements and murdering our citizens.

Yet, almost the entire amount of the appropriations hitherto made by Congress has been exhausted in abortive attempts to make reservations, and to conciliate the Indians about Salt Lake, who are already subsidised by the Mormon Church and influence; while this is the case, there has not been a solitary military station established in this district, and scarcely a dollar expended among our Indian tribes. The people in winter, have to support the Indians from charity to prevent starving; and in the summer, have had to do so from necessity, to purchase protection to life and property. At all seasons, citizens passing through, and immigrants to the Territory, are compelled to run a gauntlet through savage and inhuman enemies, ready and seeking to destroy life and property. National reputation and prosperity seem to suggest that for this district there should be created a separate Indian Agency, with an independent appropriation, and that sufficient military stations should be established along the usual line of travel.

BOUNDARY SURVEY.

As a subject of equal importance, we cannot over estimate the vexed question of Territorial jurisdiction, growing out of the disputed boundary between the State of California and this Territory. This matter has been and still is the fruitful source of annoyance and dispute. There is a large extent of territory bordering upon the eastern boundary of California, rich in population, mineral and agricultural wealth, over which up to the present time, there has been exercised no recognized local authority. For this reason, criminals, charged with grave offences have escaped conviction; crime has been boldly committed without fear of accusation, and valuable property has remained without assessment and taxation. It is not less important to the peace of our community, that for the preservation of friendly relations between the State of California and this Territory, that Congress should create a commission to survey and establish a boundary line as early as is practicable.

MORMON OUTRAGES.

We further make special reference to the following grievances, which are as disgraceful to the age of our country as they are oppressive to us:

The Mormon people are at present bitterly hostile to the government of the United States; are in the constant practice of violating the Organic Act, and commit daily outrages upon the persons and liberty of American citizens.

They make and unmake laws ad libitum, without regard to the Constitution, and commit murder and the highest crimes in defiance of the United States authority, and in contempt of law. They not only disable the federal courts by refusing and neglecting to provide means for the sustenance of the courts, but they trample upon the law, deride the federal judges and resist the executive officers. In their legislature they make purely special laws, and in violation of the Constitution. In their administration of law they screen crime and oppress the right, by disfranchising and murdering individuals, merely for being American citizens.

They prostitute their own females and have debauched helpless American women; and with systematic barbarity, have incited the Indian savages to attack and murder large bodies of unprotected people. We might prolong this detail of infamy and crime to the end of the catalogue of offences did time permit, or if it were necessary to show the necessity of some immediate and adequate protection by Congress.

NEVADA TERRITORY.

Whether this security can best be had in the creation of a new territory, or of an independent judicial district, with the right to appeal to the U. S. circuit court of California, we leave to the wiser counsels of the paternal government. In view, however, of the dissimilar tastes and interests, and of the discordant sentiments, religious and political, of the people, and of the outrages above enumerated, we submit that the best interests of the government in this Territory imperatively require some remedial legislation on the part of Congress.

RESOURCES.

Our vast and fertile plains, our fruitful pastures and teeming herds, the wonderful extent and unparalleled richness of our mines, already surround us with enviable advantages and attract the attention of neighboring communities. Our present prospects are only prophetic of our future prosperity, and our speedy attainment to a high position in the rank of sister States.

Our wealth is not only rapidly increasing with the cultivation of our fields, the increase of our herds, and the development of the mines, but it is reasonable to predict that within the next twelve months we will have a population of American citizens sufficient to justify our admission forthwith in the sisterhood of States, and thus complete the chain of civilization, religion and liberty that now reaches from the shores of the Pacific and Atlantic, and endeavors to bind the continent in one unbroken line.

As a subject of local importance, we would suggest the necessity, in the absence of sufficient county organizations, that an appropriation be made for the erection of public buildings, and to pay the Marshal, Clerk and other Territorial Officers.

In conclusion, we express our thanks for the uniform courtesy of the court and its officers, and especially to Wellington Stewart, District Attorney, for his ability and industry in ministering to the performance of our labors.

We respectfully submit the above and ask to be discharged.

Late and Interesting Intelligence from the Washoe Mine.

Mr. F. J. Hughes arrived in this city Oct. 25th, from the new mining region in Washoe valley. He left Virginia town last Saturday morning. Mr. Hughes furnished us a full and interesting description of the new diggings, and the operations now in progress there. His account is tinged with enthusiasm, but after making all due allowance for the excited state of feeling prevalent in the mines, and in which he probably participates, his narrative is well calculated to excite the attention and wonder of our readers.

Mr. Hughes went to Virginia town, the locality of the richest discoveries, in June last, and remained there until the close of last week, so that his opportunities of observation have been ample. The existence of silver in that region was discovered by three men, who were working a good claim in Six-Mile canyon, in June of the present year. Following their surface diggings, they at length struck the gold lead consisting of a black soil without lustre, so rich that portions of it yielded $80. to the pan. They found a pocket, as it is there called, filled with black metal, from which they made $100 per day, with a rocker. A number of Mexican miners from Sonora examined the tailings or refuse dirt, and informed the miners that they were throwing away two dollars of silver for each one of gold that they collected. A company of three or four Mexicans commenced working these "tailings"

About two months ago Judge Walsh took one ton of the black metal in which the silver occurred to San Francisco, in order to procure a reliable assay. The result was from $900 to $5,000 per ton, according to the parts of the mine from which the specimens were taken. It is a remarkable property of this "black metal," that it decomposes and becomes soft from exposure, to such a degree that it can even be crushed between the fingers. The claim had in the meantime been divided into six shares, two to each of the original parties. Comstock sold his for $5,500, and McLaughlin his portion for $5,000. Riley is now the only one of the original parties interested in the lead, and he has refused—so Mr. Hughes says—$10,000 for his share. Judge Walsh owns two-sixths, and is said to have been offered $60,000 for half his interest.

Mr. Hughes has with him a mass of silver mixed with gold, weighing 47 ounces, and valued at $2 per ounce. This bar was obtained from one arroba, or 25 pounds of the tailings before spoken of. Could this be taken as a fair sample of the whole it would indicate the astonishing result of a mass of refuse dirt, from which the gold had been extracted by the ordinary process, worth four dollars to the pound. The ledge in the Comstock claim has two leads of gold and one of silver ore. The gold rock has been proved by the ordinary test to be worth from $5,000 to $2,500 per ton. The silver lead consists of the black metal which is said to produce $5,000 to the ton, in the proportion of 46 of silver to 4 of gold. The gold leads are from five to nine feet thick, and the dip of the gold bearing rock is about 80 degrees, or nearly perpendicular. The entire ledge is between 15 and 20 feet wide. The silver vein is from 6 to 24 inches wide. The deposits are in Virginia town, which is twenty miles from Carson Valley, 15 from Carson City, and about 160 from Sacramento. There is a ledge of gold rock near Washoe lake which is said to have yielded $2,100 in gold to the ton.

Besides the principal deposit of silver, referred to in Mr. Hughes' narrative, he relates that more than twenty other veins have been opened in the vicinity, and are now in the process of development. It is thought that they extend all the way from Honey Lake to Walker river. The prospectings generally reveal gold on the surface; the silver appears eight or ten feet below. The most magnificent deposit of gold ever discovered, in this continent or in the world, is represented to have been opened at Gold Hill, in a canyon, or rather valley, one and a half miles from Virginia town. The hill is isolated from the mountain spurs, to which it probably once belonged, and is properly a mound about 60 feet high, 5,000 feet long by 2,000 feet wide. It is traversed by veins of auriferous quartz, partly decomposed, yielding from $500 to $2,500 to the ton. This enormous mass of wealth was discovered by a whiskey-drinking character from Virginia, in honor of whom the neighboring village has been named. It is computed that this fortunate person has expended within two months eight or ten thousand dollars in the purchase of his favorite fluid, for the consumption of himself and his friends. This fact is considered interesting, as tending to prove the wealth of the country and the thirst of the inhabitants.

There are now 18 arrastras in operation at Virginia town, and 8 or 9 at Gold Hill. Many more are in course of erection. Lumber is scarce in the Washoe region, on account of the distance over which it must be drawn, and the incapacity of the mills to supply the demand, suddenly increased as it has been, by the rush of population caused by the opening of the mines. The nearest timber, suitable for lumbering purposes, is fifteen miles from the mines, and the mills, which can be relied upon for a supply, are twenty-five miles distant. The price of lumber at Virginia town is $50 per thousand. The habits of the people are necessarily nomadic and sporadic. They live in tents, as many of them as can secure that accommodation; those who cannot, sleep in haystacks. When meals can be had, they are furnished at the reasonable price of 75 cents each.

About 50 tons of silver has already been sent to San Francisco, or is on the way thither; and Mr. Hughes passed almost 100 teams going out with provisions and general supplies. The price of freight has been raised to 10 cents per pound or $200 per ton from Placerville; but the silver ore is brought this way for half that rate. The rush to the mines is so great, that a daily line has been arranged for. On the day on which he arrived at Placerville, six full stage loads of passengers had been engaged for the next trip.

Mr. Hughes states that ten feet claims are selling at from $2,500 to $3,000 each. He states that the favorite domicile is the wagon; all sleep in these who can get them, and the rest manage as already stated, to sleep in board-shanties, haystacks, tents etc.

Mail Routes.

An increase of service upon the overland mail route to Placerville, is called for by all parties and sections, both of California and the East. The foolish prejudice that has so long existed against this route, is happily giving way to a correct appreciation of its merits. There are now large settlements along it, that require daily or semi-weekly intercourse with each other, or with the States at its extremities. Since the establishment of the overland mails, great changes have taken place. Settlements, however, have not followed the stage lines as we anticipated they would. This, we think, is owing to the general impression among the people, and also among the contractors themselves, of the impropriety of the routes selected, and their want of permanency. Should a line be established by the most direct course through the settlements of the Kansas gold mines, Camp Floyd and Carson Valley, to Placerville, such a confidence in its stability would obtain, that every available spot of ground where a home could be made, would soon be occupied by thrifty farmers, and a chain of settlements would spring up that would become an additional support to such line.

A tri-weekly mail from Placerville to any railroad terminus in Missouri, could be run profitably for a less amount than now paid for a semi-weekly upon the southern line. Love and Sorrow.

Love once built a summer bower,
Filled with golden treasures;
"Here," he said, "come shine or shower,
I will pass my leisure.
Care and grief, with brow severe,
Never more shall enter here,
And no winter in my year
Shall disturb my pleasure."

But, alas! as Time flew by,
Love, by sadness haunted,
Pined for want of sympathy,
Sighed for something wanted.
Pleasure's debt was hard to pay,
Constant light obscured his way,
Wear grew the summer day
In that bower enchanted.

Waiting thus in lonely pride,
Lol a stranger sought him;
Walking sadly by his side,
To the world she brought him.
To the world of grief and care,
To the healthy open air,
And to pathways bleak and bare,
Where this truth she taught him:

"Sorrow is my name," she said:
"Thou my strength must sorrow:
Tears to-day like rain-drops shed
Feed the flowers to-morrow."
Since that time the world can prove
In a magic round they move;
Sorrow purifying love,
Love consoling sorrow.
—Charles Mackay.

Wooling the Widow.

In a bower a widow dwelt,
At her feet three lovers knelt;
Each adored the widow much,
Each essayed her heart to touch;
One had wit, and one had gold,
One was cast in beauty's mould;
Guess which was it won the prize—
Tongue, or purse, or handsome eyes?

First began the handsome man,
Peeping proudly o'er her fan,
Red lips and white his skin,
Could such beauty fail to win?
Then stepped forth the man of gold,
Cash he counted, coin he told;
Wealth the burden of his tale,
Could such golden projects fail?

Then the man of wit and sense,
Now'd her with his eloquence:
Now she heard him with a sigh,
Then she blushed, scarce knowing
why;
Then she smiled, hear him speak,
Then a tear was on her cheek;
Beauty vanish, gold depart,
Wit hath won the widow's heart.

A Terrible Revenge.

[From Once a Week.]

Of our pleasant party at the Elms
last Christmas, Kate O'Hara was the beauty, far away. I remember our silence of admiration as she came into the drawing-room just before dinner was announced (for your prima dona does not care to enter until the house is full), and the great sensation her arrival made, though she could not have approached more quietly or meekly if she had been the cat. Half-a-dozen young ladies who, before her advent, looked pretty enough, suddenly became quite uninteresting to a corresponding number of bachelors, and even we married gentlemen paused a while in our talk of short-horns to steal an admiring glance. We had resumed our bovine conversation, and were diverging, if I remember aright, in the direction of the Prince Consort's pigs, when my wife came up to me
and whispered:

"That's little Kate O'Hara!"
"Why did my cheek glow and my heart throb? Why did the name of one whom I had not seen since she was a little child recall at once the crowning happiness and chief confusion of my life?"

It shall be told, terribly, anon.
The six bachelors "entered themselves" immediately for "the O'Hara stakes," as one of them was subsequently pleased to designate the dreaming of Love's young dream;
and two of them—a middy and an under-graduate—got the start, and made the running at the most reckless pace I ever saw. Indeed, the sailor proposed on the third evening,
and was declined with such good-natured cheerfulness that he seemed rather to be pleased than otherwise;
whereas the collegian, who was of a poetical turn, took his refusal, the day following, very seriously to heart,
and passed the remaining part of his visit in sorrow and the shrubberies.
Two other competitors, unattached (except to Kate), were disposed of at an archery ball; and the race then lay between Charley Northcote, captain of hussars, and Philip Lee, curate.

It was a grand set-to—"hands up," I can tell you. If Charley had the handsomest face, and, playing with a bullet pendant from his watch-chain, but which had previously resided in his leg, could talk of the time "when I was in the Crimea," Philip had the more intellectual expression, and had won at Oxford the undergraduate's
"blue ribbon"—the Newgate prize for English verse. Charley, it is true, when we were skating on the lake, produced upon the ice such wondrous "eagles" as Audubon never dreamed of; but he was, on the other hand, the first to own, when the frost broke up, that "in a really good thing with hounds, there was not one of them could catch the parson." For Philip, tho' he did not hunt in his own parish, could "go like a bird" out of it, whenever he could get a mount.

On the night before our party separated, we had a grand performance of charades, and, in the last of these the Rev. Mr. Lee had won immense applause as a ferocious captain of banditti, acting with the greatest enthusiasm, and having composed for himself, with the co-operation of a cork, a pair of mustaches which rivalled Charley's. We were to appear at supper in our charade costumes, and were waiting the announcement of that refectory, when I noticed an extraordinary phenomenon which caused me instantly and earnestly to whisper to Miss O'Hara,
"I have something to say to you.— Come at once."

We passed unnoticed from the crowded drawing-room into the library, still littered with our theatrical properties. Seizing a dagger, and assuming a characteristic scowl
(I was attired as a brigand's assistant,) I bade her "listen!" And she (I see her now in her pretty hat and cloak, for she had represented in our last scene the young English countess stopped by the robbers,) ever ready for burlesque and mirth—as she supposed all this to be—made answer
solemnly:

"Say on."
"Twelve years ago, Catherine O' Hara, I wooed and won in the home of your childhood the lady who is now my wife. On a sweet summer's eve I told my love, sitting under an acacia, and upon a garden-seat the property of your respected sire.—
Hard by, you, then a little child, were swinging in a swing. Those same long silken Irish lashes drooped over those deep blue eyes, and we never dreamed that you took note
of us, sealing, in the usual manner,
our vows of mutual love. Judge, then, how intense our agony, how
complete and awful our abasement,
when as we rejoined the festive throng for coffee, you cried aloud for all to hear:

"Oh, mamma! those two did so kiss each other, when I was swinging in the elm!"

"For twelve years, Kate O'Hara,
the memory of that humiliation has troubled my indignant soul; but at last I am avenged—look here!"
I held before her one of the hand-looking-glasses which lay on the table near, and she was preparing to say something in the dramatic style, as she snatched it from me with the proud air of a tragedy queen, when her eye caught the reflection of her face, and in a moment that fair countenance was blanched and pale, and she stood, with her head drooping, speechless. For upon her lip, reader, she saw, as I had seen, the certain sign and trace that, in some obscure corner behind the scenes, the race had been decided for the "O' Hara Stakes," and that the Brigand
Lee had won.

"Kate," I said, "you cannot be vexed with me, for I congratulate you with all my heart. May you be as happy, dear girl, with our friend
the Robber as 'those two have been happy, as you saw 'so kissing one another,' from beneath those silken lashes as you sat swinging in the elm."

A Council of Ministers of the Christian Baptist persuasion was held at Warren, on Wednesday, to investigate the following charges made against the Rev. S. K. Sweetman of Boston, Mass.: The publication of an unclerical pamphlet; making false representations to a Bristol church, in order to hurry it into a bargain; borrowing a shirt and not returning it; sermon-stealing, and advertising for a wife while his third one was still living.

A London journal, discussing

Your Baby.

BY SPENCER W. CONZ.

Out of all the little people
That you know,
Great folks' children, poor folks' babies,
High or low;
Big or little, blondes, brunettes,
Dark eyed beauties, blue eyed pets;
Or the ugliest of abortions
With pug-noses for their portions—
Noses pug for facial handles,
Hair that curls like pounds of candles—
Out of all the little people,
You can bring,

Nine miles round, from any steeples,
In a ring—
Did you ever see a darling,
Whom its "ma" like Hotspur's startling,
With unending iteration,
Didn't say beat all creation
Into bits?

No, ma'am—no, sir—miss or master—
Never came such sad disaster
Not one horrid doubt would cast her Into fits.

Don't you pity Mrs. Snivins?
Don't you feel for Mrs. Bivins?
Snivins' baby has red hair;
Bivins' squints, I do declare.
Did you ever?
But my baby—oh, the precious!
Ain't she perfectly delicious?
Papa's nose and mamma's eyes;
And so good: she never cries—
Never! never!

This, and nothing more, my moral,
(And with it who dares to quarrel?)
Babies are to woman given
By the special grace of heaven,
And that alone;
By divine interposition,
To compel from her admission
That one perfect thing there may be,
Yes, a baby! Hum! what baby?
Wretch!—her own.

The Kennebec Journal says that a few years since the wife of the then American Minister to England received from a friend in New-England a box of Autumnal leaves, selected for their beauty and their variety of tints. The lady wore them as ornaments, and they attracted much attention, and were greatly admired by the English people. Since this,
these leaves have been in demand there,
and every Autumn packages of them
are sent over in the steamer, and flash
their in the high circles of London.

Mayor Mayo, the "pet of the 7th" of Richmond, Va., has hit upon a novel and original expedient for securing vigilance from his night police. It is no less a scheme than offering a premium of $10 for every officer's baton presented in the morning, and which can be shown to have been taken while its proper possessor was asleep.

A lady came near losing her life by a singular accident, in Louisville, while riding in a buggy. One end of a scarf, which she wore around her shoulders,
blew off, and was caught in the spokes
of one of the rapidly revolving wheels of the vehicle, and wound up in such a manner as to draw her neck down to the wheel, choking her severely.

Mr. Clay, in a speech May 10, 1848, upon the question of the power of Congress relative to the territories, said:
"That the true principle for Congress,
in all future time, is to abstain from all legislation upon the subject of slavery in the territories."

The Conspiracy at Harper's Ferry.

The interesting narrative which we copy below, prepared for the Baltimore American by a correspondent who accompanied a detachment of military to Harper's Ferry, will afford the reader full information as to the originators of the late fanatical conspiracy at that place, as well as of their antecedents and of the manner in which their fool-hardy enterprise was suppressed. The whole affair presents some extraordinary characteristics on the part of the leaders, and shows the absurd process by which monomaniacs sometimes attempt to carry out their purposes. They have in this case met with a fearful retribution. Of the twenty-three persons of whom their party originally consisted fifteen are now dead and three mortally wounded, two unhurt have been made prisoners, and three only have succeeded in making their escape. Some later intelligence from the scene of the disturbance will be found on the next page of this paper.

THE ORIGINATORS OF THE CONSPIRACY.

The principal originator of the insurrection, and the chief leader in its short but bloody existence, was undoubtedly Captain John Brown, whose connection with the scenes of violence and border warfare in Kansas then made his name familiarly notorious to the whole country. Captain Brown made his first appearance in the vicinity of Harper's Ferry more than a year ago, accompanied by his two sons, the whole party assuming the name of Smith. They inquired about land in the vicinity, made investigations as to the probability of finding ore, and for some time boarded at Sandy Hook, a mile east of Harper's Ferry. After a absence of some months they reappeared in the vicinity, and the elder Brown rented or leased a farm on the Maryland side, about four miles from Harper's Ferry. They bought a large number of picks and spades, and thus confirmed the belief that they intended to mine for ore. They were seen frequently in and about Harper's Ferry, but no suspicion seems to have existed that "Bill Smith" was Captain Brown, or that he intended embarking in a movement of desperate and extraordinary nature. The development of the plot leaves no doubt that his visits to the Ferry and his lease of the farm were all parts of his preparation for an insurrection which he proposed was to be successful in exterminating slavery in Maryland and Western Virginia. Captain Brown's chief aid was John E. Cook, a comparatively young man, who has resided in and near Harper's Ferry for some years. He was first employed in tending a lock on the canal. He afterwards taught school on the Maryland side, and, after a brief residence in Kansas, where it is supposed that he became acquainted with Brown, returned to the Ferry, and married there. He was regarded as a man of some intelligence, known to be anti-slavery, but not so violent in the expression of his opinions as to excite any suspicions. These two men, with Brown's two sons, were the only white men connected with the insurrection that had been seen at the Ferry. All were brought by Captain Brown from a distance, and nearly all had been with him in Kansas.

THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE INSURRECTION.

The first active movement in the insurrection was made about half-past ten o'clock on Sunday night. Wm. Williams, watchman on Harper's Ferry bridge, whilst walking across towards the Maryland side, was seized by a number of men, who said he was their prisoner and must come with them. He recognized Brown and Cook among the men, and, knowing them, treated the matter as a joke; but, enforcing silence, they conducted him to the Armory, which he found already in their possession. He was retained till after daylight and then discharged. The watchman who was to relieve Williams at midnight found the bridge lights all out, and immediately was seized. Supposing it an attempt at robbery, he broke away, and his pursuers stumbling over the track, he escaped.

The next appearance of the insurrectionists was at the house of Col. Lewis Washington, a large farmer and slave owner, living about four miles from Harper's Ferry. A party headed by Cook proceeded there, roused Col. W., and told him he was a prisoner. They also seized all the slaves near the house, took a carriage and horse, and a large wagon with two horses. When Col. Washington saw Cook he immediately recognized him as a man who had called upon him some months previous, to whom he had exhibited some valuable arms in his possession, including an antique sword presented by Frederick the Great to Gen. Washington, and a pair of pistols presented by Lafayette to Washington, both heirlooms in the family. Before leaving Cook invited Col. Washington to a trial of skill at shooting, and exhibited considerable certainty as a marksman. When he made his visit on Sunday night he included to his previous visit, and the courtesy with which he had been treated, regretting the necessity which made it his duty to arrest Col. W. He, however, took advantage of the knowledge he obtained by the former visit to carry off all the Colonel's valuable collection of arms, which he did not re-obtain until after the final defeat of the insurrection. From Col. Washington's they proceeded, with him a prisoner in his carriage, and twelve of his negroes in the wagon, to the house of Mr. Allstadt, another large farmer on the same road. Mr. Allstadt and his son, a lad of sixteen, were taken prisoners, all their negroes within reach forced to join the movement, and they returned to the Armory at the Ferry.

All these movements seemed to have been made without exciting the slightest alarm in the town, nor did the detention of the railroad train at the upper end of the town attract attention. It was not until the town thoroughly waked up and found the bridge guarded by armed men, and a guard stationed at all the avenues, that the people found they were prisoners. A panic appears to have immediately ensued, and the number of the insurrectionists was at once magnified from fifty, which was probably their greatest force, including the slaves forced to join, to from five to six hundred. In the meantime a number of the workmen, knowing nothing of what had occurred, entered the Armory, and were instantly made prisoners, until at one time they had not less than sixty men confined. Among those thus entrapped were Armstrong Ball, chief draughtsman of the Armory, Benjamin Mills, master of the Armory, and J. E. P. Daingerfield, paymaster's clerk. These three gentlemen were imprisoned in the engine-house, which afterwards became the chief fortress of the insurgents, and were not released until after the final assault. The workmen were imprisoned in a building farther down the yard, and were rescued by the brilliant Zouave dash made by the railroad company's men who came down from Martinsburg.

This was the condition of things at daylight, about which time Capt. Cook with two white men, and accompanied by thirty slaves, and taking with them Col. Washington's large wagon, went over the bridge and struck up the mountain road toward Pennsylvania. It was then believed that the large wagon was used to convey away the paymaster's safe, containing $17,000 in Government funds, and also that it was filled with Minie rifles taken out to supply other bands in the mountains who were to come down upon Harper's Ferry in overwhelming force. These suppositions both proved untrue, as neither money nor arms were disturbed.

THE BEGINNING OF THE FIGHT.

As the day advanced, and the news spread around, and the people came into the Ferry, the first demonstrations of resistance were made to the insurrectionists. A guerrilla warfare commenced, chiefly led on by a man named Chambers, whose house commanded the Armory yard. The colored man, named Hayward, railroad porter, was shot early in the morning for refusing to join the movement. The next man shot was Joseph Burley, a citizen of Harper's Ferry. He was shot whilst standing in his own door. About this time also Samuel P. Young, Esq., was shot dead. He was coming into the town on horseback, carrying a gun, when he was shot from the Armory, receiving a wound of which he died during the day. He was a graduate of West Point, and greatly respected in the neighborhood for his high character and noble qualities.

The insurrectionists at this time, finding a disposition to resist them, had withdrawn nearly all within the Armory grounds, leaving only a guard on the bridge. About noon the Charlestown troops, under command of Col. Robert W. Baylor, arrived, crossing the Potomac river some distance up, and marching down the Maryland side to the mouth of the bridge. Firing a volley, they made a gallant dash across the bridge, clearing it of the insurrectionists, who retreated rapidly down towards the Armory. In this movement one of the insurrectionists, named William Thompson, was taken prisoner. The Shepherdstown troops next arrived, marching down the Shenandoah side and joining the Charlestown forces at the bridge. A desultory exchange of shots followed, one of which struck Mr. Fountain Beckham, Mayor of the town and agent of the railroad company, in the breast, passing entirely through his body. The ball was a large elongated slug, making a dreadful wound. He died almost immediately. Mr. Beckham was without arms and was exposed only for a moment whilst approaching the water station. His assailant, one of Brown's sons, was shot almost immediately, but managed to get back to the engine house, where his dead body was found the next day. The murder of Mr. Beckham excited the people, and the cry was immediately made to bring out the prisoner Thompson. He was brought out on the bridge and shot down; from the bridge he fell into the water, and some appearance of life still remaining he was again riddled with balls.

FURTHER CONFLICTS.

At this time a general charge was made down the street from the bridge toward the Armory gate by the Charlestown and Shepherdstown troops and the Ferry people. From behind the Armory wall a fusillade was kept up and returned by the insurrectionists from the Armory buildings. While this was going on the Martinsburg levies arrived at the upper end of the town, and entering the Armory grounds from the rear made an attack from that end. This force was largely composed of the railroad employees gathered from the tonnage trains at Martinsburg, and their attack was generally spoken of as showing the greatest amount of fighting pluck exhibited during the day. Dashing on, firing and cheering, and gallantly led by Captain Alburtil, they carried the building in which the Armory men were imprisoned and released the whole of them. They were, however, but poorly armed, some with pistols and others with shot guns, and when they came within range of the engine house, where the elite of the insurrectionists were gathered, and were exposed to their rapid and dexterous use of Sharp's rifles, they were forced to fall back. Conductor Evan Dorsey, of Baltimore, was mortally wounded, and Conductor George Richardson received a wound from which he died during the day. Several others were wounded, among them a son of Dr. Murphy, of Harper's Ferry.

A guerrilla warfare was maintained during the rest of the day, resulting in killing three of the insurgents and wounding of a fourth. One of them crawled out through a culvert leading into the Potomac and attempted to cross to the Maryland side, whether with a view of escaping or of conveying information to Cook's party was not known. He was shot whilst crossing the river, and fell dead on the rocks. An adventurous lad waded out and secured his Sharp's rifle, and the body was afterwards stripped of a portion of its clothing. In one of his pockets was found a captain's commission, drawn up in full form, and declaring the bearer, Capt. Leeman, held that command under Major General Brown. A light musket was also shot just outside the Armory gate. The ball went through and through his throat, tearing away all the great arteries and killing him almost instantly. His name was not known, but he was one of the free negroes who came with Captain Brown. At this moment a tall, powerful man, named Aaron Stevens, came out from the Armory conducting some prisoners; it was said, and was shot twice, once in the side of the face and once in the breast. He was captured and taken into the tavern, and after the insurrection had been quelled was turned over in a dying condition to the U. S. authorities. Another man was shot in the Arsenal yard.

During the afternoon a sharp little affair took place on the Shenandoah side of the town. The insurrectionists had also seized Hall's rifle works, and a party of their assailants found their way in through the mill-race and dislodged them. In this rencontre it is said that three of the insurrectionists were killed, but we found but one dead body, that of a negro, on that side of the city. Night by this time had come on and active operations ceased. Guards were placed around the Armory and every precaution taken to prevent escapes.

ARRIVAL OF THE MILITARY.

At 10 o'clock on Monday night the train with the Baltimore military and United States marines arrived at Sandy Hook, where they waited for the arrival of Col. Lee, deputized by the War Department to take command. The reporters pressed on, leaving their military allies behind. They found the bridge in possession of the military, and entered the besieged and beleaguered town without difficulty, the occasional report of a gun or the singing motion of a Sharp's rifle ball warning them that it was advisable to keep out of range of the Armory. Their first visit was to the bedside of Aaron Stevens, the wounded prisoner. They found him a large, exceedingly athletic man, a perfect Sampson in appearance. He was in a small room, filled with excited armed men, who more than once threatened to shoot him where he was, groaning with pain, but answering with composure and apparent willingness every question in relation to the foray in which he was engaged. He said he was a native of Connecticut, but had lately lived in Kansas, where he knew Captain Brown. He had also served in the United States Army. The sole object of the attempt was to give the negroes freedom, and Captain Brown had represented that as soon as they seized the Armory the negroes would flock to them by thousands, and they would soon have force enough to accomplish their purposes. He believed that the freeing of the negroes was a proper purpose, one for which he would sacrifice his life, but thought that Captain Brown had been greatly deceived in relation to the movement. He said preparations had been making for some months for the movement, but that the whole force consisted of seventeen white men and five free negroes. This statement was repeated without variation by all the prisoners with whom we conversed. They all agreed as to the number in the movement, and as to its objects, which some of them called the work of philanthropy. Lewis Leary, the negro shot at the rifle mill, stated before he died that he enlisted with Captain Brown for the insurrection at a fair held in Lorain county, Ohio, and received money from him to pay his expenses. They all came down to Chambersburg, Pa., and from there traveled across the country to Brown's farm.

HOW THE NIGHT PASSED.

The night passed without serious alarms, but not without excitement. The marines were marched over immediately after the arrival of Col. Lee, and were stationed within the armory grounds so as to completely surround the engine house. Occasional shots were fired by the country volunteers—what for was not understood; but there was only one return fire from the insurgents. The broken telegraph was soon repaired through the exertions of Superintendents Westervelt and Talcott, who accompanied the expedition, and the announcement that communication was opened with Baltimore gave the "press representatives" abundant employment.

There was no finding any bed, and daylight was awaited with considerable anxiety. The earliest glimpses were availed of to survey the scene. A visit to the different localities in which the corpses of the insurrectionists were lying stark and bloody, a peep, close or far off, according to the courage of the observer, at the "Malakoff" of the insurgents, was the established order of sight-seeing, varied with a discussion of all sorts of terrible rumors.

PORT OF THE INSURGENTS.

The building in which the insurgents had made their stand was the fire engine-house, and no doubt the most defensible building in the Armory. It has dead brick walls on three sides, and on the fourth large doors, with window-shades above, some eight feet from the ground. A dead stillness surrounded the building, and, except that now and then a man might be seen peeping from the nearly closed centre door, or a dog's nose slightly protruding, there was no sign of life, much less of hostility, given. Various opinions were given as to the number of persons within, and the amount of resistance they would be able to offer. Cannon could not be used without endangering the safety of Col. Washington, Mr. Daingerfield, Mr. Ball, and other citizens whom they still held prisoners. The doors and walls of the building had been pierced for rifles, but it was evident that from these holes no range could be had, and that without opening the door they would be shooting in the dark. The murder of the prisoners held was thought by many to be determined upon, and then a fight to the death as an ending of their desperate attempt. Whilst people thus looked and speculated, the door was thrown open and one of the prisoners was sent out with a flag of truce, and delivered what was supposed to be terms of capitulation. The continuance of the preparations for assault... red they were not accepted.

THE ATTACK AND CAPTURE.

Shortly after seven o'clock Lieut. J. E. B. Stuart, of the 1st Cavalry, who was acting as aid for Col. Lee, advanced to parley with the besieged, Samuel Strider, Esq., a lawyer and newspaper editor, having a flag of truce. They were received at the door by Captain Cook. Lieut. Stuart demanded an unconditional surrender, only promising them protection from immediate violence and trial by law. Capt. Brown refused all terms but those previously demanded, which were substantially: "That he should be permitted to march out with his men and arms, taking their prisoners with them, that they should proceed unpursued to the second toll-gate, when they would free their prisoners. The soldiers were then at liberty to pursue and they would fight if they could not escape." Of course this was refused, and Lieut. Stuart pressed upon Brown his desperate position, and urged a surrender. The exasperation, though beyond ear-shot, was evidently very earnest, and the coolness of the Lieutenant and courage of his aged flag bearer won warm praise.

At this moment the interest of the scene was intense. The volunteers were arranged all around the building, cutting off escape in every direction. The marines, divided into two squads, were ready for a dash at the door. Finally, Lieut. Stuart having exhausted all argument with the determined Capt. Brown, walked slowly from the door.

Immediately the signal for attack was given, and the marines, headed by Col. Harris and Lieut. Green, advanced in two lines on each side of the door. Two powerful fellows sprang between the lines and with heavy slugs hammers attempted to batter down the door. The door swung and away, but appeared to be secured with a rope, the spring of which deadened the effect of the blow. Failing thus to obtain a breach, the marines were ordered to fall back, and twenty of them took hold of a ladder, some forty feet long, and advancing at a run brought it with tremendous power against the door. At the second blow it gave way, one leaf falling inward in a slanting position. The marines immediately advanced to the breach, Major Russell and Lieut. Green leading. A marine in the front fell; the firing from the interior is rapid and sharp; they fire with deliberate aim, and for the moment the resistance is serious and desperate enough to excite the spectators to something like a pitch of frenzy. The next moment the marines pour in, the firing ceases, and the work was done, whilst the cheers rang from every side, the general feeling being that the marines had done their part admirably.

When the insurgents were brought out—some dead, others wounded—they were greeted with execrations, and only the precautions that had been taken saved them from immediate execution. The crowd, nearly every man of which had a gun, swayed with tumultuous excitement, and cries of "shoot them," "shoot them," rang from every side. The appearance of the liberated prisoners, all of whom, through the steadiness of the marines, escaped injury, changed the current of feeling, and prolonged cheers took the place of howls and execrations. In the assault private Rupert, of the marines, received a ball in the stomach and was believed to be fatally wounded; another received a slight flesh wound in the face.

THE DEAD AND WOUNDED.

The lawn in front of the engine-house after the assault presented a dreadful sight. Lying on it were two bodies of men killed the previous day and found inside the house; three wounded men, one just at the last gasp of life, two others groaning in pain. One of the dead was Capt. Brown's son Ottawa, the wounded man his son Watson, while the father himself laid upon the grass a gory spectacle, his face and hair clotted with blood and a severe bayonet wound in his side.

CAPT. BROWN'S STATEMENT.

A short time after Capt. Brown was brought out he revived and talked earnestly to those about him, defending his course and avowing that he had done only what was right. He replied to questions substantially as follows:

Q. Are you Capt. Brown of Kansas?
A. I am sometimes called so.
Q. Are you Osawattamie Brown?
A. I tried to do my duty there.
Q. What was your present object?
A. To free the slaves from bondage.
Q. Were any other persons but those with you now connected with the movement?
A. No.
Q. Did you expect aid from the North?
A. No; there was none connected with the movement but those who came with me.
Q. Did you expect to kill people in order to carry your point?
A. I did not wish to do it, but you forced me to do it.

Various questions of this kind were put to Capt. Brown, which he answered clearly and freely and seemed anxious to vindicate his course. He urged that he had the town at his mercy—that he could have burned it and murdered its inhabitants, but did not. He had treated the prisoners he had taken with courtesy, and complained that he was hunted down like a beast. He spoke of the killing of his son, which he alleged was done whilst he was bearing a flag of truce, and seemed very anxious for the safety of the wounded son. Altogether his conversation bore the impress of a conviction that whatever he had done to free slaves was right, and that in the war in which he was engaged he was entitled to be treated with all the respect of a prisoner of war. He seemed fully convinced that he had been badly treated, and had a right to complain.

When first brought out he was supposed to be mortally wounded, and he himself said he was dying. An examination of his wounds proved them to be not necessarily fatal, and he afterwards expressed a desire to live and to be tried by his country. In his pockets a considerable number of papers were found, among which were the articles of agreement under which the insurrectionists acted, and what purported to be a schedule for the establishment of "provisional government." In his pockets were found nearly four hundred dollars in gold, which was committed to the care of Dr. Murphy, the Armory paymaster. The most important papers found in his possession were taken in charge of by Col. Lee, on behalf of the Government. The following note, characteristic of the pursuits of the man, fell into our possession:

THE PRISONERS.

Capt. John Brown, the commander and instigator of this most singular project, has been known by the name of "Osawattamie Brown," in which character he obtained quite a notoriety throughout the country as one of the leaders of the Free State party in Kansas. He was the hero of fifty guerrilla fights in the vicinity of Osawattamie, in one of which his son Frederick Brown was killed. His skill and bravery in this species of warfare was undisputed. The two sons who were with him in the Harper's Ferry invasion were also with him in his Kansas fights. Ottawa Jones, especially, figured extensively with his father in Kansas, and his residence between Lawrence and Osawattamie was destroyed by fire by the pro-slavery men on the same day that his brother was killed.

Besides Capt. Brown the prisoners taken are his son, who is seriously wounded in the abdomen and not likely to live; Edwin Coppuck, who belongs to Iowa, and a negro named Shields Green, who came from Pittsburg to join Brown. The stories of all these men are precisely the same; they agree as to the object they proposed to accomplish and the number of parties in the movement. Young Brown, in answer to a question, said that there were parties in the North connected with the movement—thus differing with his father on this point. Coppuck, the other white prisoner, is quite young, and seems less shrewd than the others. He said he did not wish to join the expedition, and when asked, gave a reply which showed the influence Brown had over him. He said: "Ah! you gentlemen don't know Captain Brown; when he calls for us we never think of refusing to come."

Several slaves were found in the room with the insurrectionists, but it is not believed that they were there willingly. Indeed Brown's expectations as to the slaves running to him were entirely disappointed. None seem to have come to him willingly, and in most cases they were forced to desert their masters. But one instance in which a slave made a public appearance with arms in his hands is related. A negro who had been sharply scolded by one of the town people, when he found he had a pike in his hand, used his "brief authority" to arrest the citizen and have him taken to the Armory.

THE IMPRISONED CITIZENS.

The citizens imprisoned by the insurrectionists all testify to their lenient treatment. They were neither tied nor insulted, and, beyond the outrage of restricting their liberty, were not ill-used. Capt. Brown was always courteous to them, and at all times assured them they should not be injured. He explained his purposes to them, and whilst he had the workmen in confinement made an abolition speech to them. Col. Washington speaks of him as a man of extraordinary nerves.

He never blenched during the assault, though he admitted during the night that escape was impossible and he would have to die. When the door was broken down one of his men cried out, "I surrender." The Captain immediately cried out, one surrenders, give him quarter," and at the same moment fired his own rifle at the door. During the previous night he spoke freely with Colonel Washington, and referred to his sons. He said he had lost one in Kansas and two here; he had pressed them to join him in this expedition, but he did not regret their loss, they had "died in a glorious cause." The position of the prisoners in the engine-house during the firing on Monday and at the moment of the final attack was a very trying one. Without any of the incentives of combat they had to risk the balls of their friends, but happily they all escaped. At the moment when the doors were broken in the prisoners, at the suggestion of Col. Washington, threw up their hands, so that it might be seen they were not combatants.

EXCITING SCENES.

During the morning armed men continued to pour into Harper's Ferry in all sorts of costume and with every variety of arms. Over two hundred men came in on horseback, and probably there were from one thousand to twelve hundred men assembled there. The desire to inflict summary vengeance was exhibited in the strongest manner; and the vindictive feeling existing found one mode of expression not at all commendable. The body of one of Brown's party, shot in the river the previous day, was dislodged from the rock on which it fell and came floating down. As it passed down toward the bridge it was made the target for probably a hundred shots, and must have been thoroughly riddled with balls.

DISCOVERY AND SEIZURE OF ARMS.

On Tuesday morning one of Col. Washington's negroes came in and reported that Cook was in the mountains only three miles off. About the same time some shots were said to have been fired from the Maryland hills, and a rapid fusillade was returned from Harper's Ferry.

The Independent Greys, of Baltimore, immediately started on a scouting expedition, and in two hours returned with two wagons loaded with arms and ammunition found at Capt. Brown's house. The arms consisted of boxes filled with Sharpe's rifles, pistols, &c., all bearing the marks of the Massachusetts Manufacturing Company, at Chicopee, Massachusetts. There were also found a quantity of United States ammunition, a large number of spears, (sharp iron-bowle knives fixed on a pole, a terrible looking weapon), intended for the use of the negroes, with axes, pick-axes, shovels, and every thing that might be needed; thus proving that the expedition was well provided for, that a large party of men were expected to be armed, and that abundant means had been provided to meet all exigencies. How all these supplies were got up to his farm without attracting observation is not known. They are supposed to have been brought through Pennsylvania.

The Greys pursued Cook so closely that they secured part of his arms, but with his more perfect knowledge of the localities he was enabled to evade capture. On their arrival at the Ferry with the enemy's spoil they were greeted with hearty cheers. The wagons were driven into the Armory yard and given into the custody of the Government. As every body else, however, who could lay his hand on a Sharpe's rifle considered it legitimate spoil, why should not the Greys have a claim on their valuable capture?

The insurrectionists did not attempt to rob the Paymaster's department at the Armory. A large amount of money was there, but it was untouched.

Perfect order having been restored, the military, with the exception of the United States marines, who remained in charge of the prisoners, left in the various trains for home. An immense train brought the Baltimore troops, accompanied by the Frederick troops, from accident or detention that is a great characteristic of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad.

INCIDENTS OF THE FIRST CONFLICT.

A gentleman who returned to Baltimore from Harper's Ferry on Tuesday evening has furnished the Sun with the following account of the capture of the bridge and town early on Tuesday morning:

The first attack was made by a detachment of the Charlestown (Va.) Guards. They crossed the Potomac river above Harper's Ferry, and reached the building where the insurgents were posted by the canal, on the Maryland side. A smart firing occurred, and the rioters were driven from the bridge. One man was killed here and another arrested.

A man ran out of the building and tried to escape by swimming the river. A dozen shots were fired after him and he partially fell, but rose again, threw his gun away, and drew his pistols. Both snuffed, and he drew a bowie-knife cut his heavy accoutrements off, and

THE VALLEY TAN.

STEPHEN DEWOLFE, Editor.

Wednesday, Dec. 7, 1859.

Have the Mormons been persecuted?

The cry of "persecution" is one of the most effective agencies made use of by the Mormon leaders and mouth-pieces, to keep alive in the breasts of the honest but deluded masses of their sect, the enmity and jealousy which they not only bear towards those who do not subscribe to their infatuated belief, but likewise to the Government itself. These leaders are generally, if not uniformly, devoid of the talent or ability that would be necessary to elevate men above their fellows, in any other community than this; but they possess much low cunning, and are intimately conversant with the kind of materials that they have to work upon, and the best means for keeping alive the fallacies which they have succeeded in implanting in many weak but honest minds. Knowing, in the first place, that "ignorance is the mother of devotion," and aware, likewise, of the tenacity, mingled with extreme sensitiveness with which simple and credulous persons cling to a belief once formed on the subject of religion, they make use of this knowledge, by working in every imaginable form upon the superstition and prejudices of such, to awaken and confirm in their minds a feeling of enmity and opposition to all who differ with them in belief. Sometimes prophecies of dreadful calamities—of pestilence, famine and earthquakes are thundered against all who oppose the "onward march of Zion." Sometimes the most barefaced and shameless falsehoods are invented to prove that the enemies of the church are already experiencing the indignation and judgments of the Almighty, for opposing the progress of the great "latter day work." Thus, we not long since heard a returned missionary (Heaven save the mark!) state, in substance, from the Tabernacle in this city, that the people in the States had very little to eat—that they were in a destitute and nearly famished condition—that in some localities the inhabitants were reduced to such extremities that it was impossible to procure even the common necessities of life, with a great deal more of such like stuff, which is known to every man, of even the commonest intelligence, to be utterly false, for crops were never more abundant, nor prosperity more general throughout the country than during the present year. But neither prophecies of calamities to come, nor fabrications of those that do not exist, constitute so effective a weapon for stimulating the opposition and zeal of the membership, as the cry of "persecution," which is constantly raised.

"This is the harp of a thousand strings," upon which every conceivable change is rung, and which is constantly played for the edification or delusion of the masses. We hear of persecutions in Ohio, in Missouri, in Illinois, in Utah, everywhere indeed, where the Mormons have ever been. Persecutions in every shape and of every form—persecutions compared with which, those which St. Paul states were inflicted upon him were merciful and mild. The Prophet Joseph was slain in Illinois; the Prophet Brigham has been pursued like a beast of prey, and thousands seek his blood. The Lord only knows how many other prophets have suffered, or what untold afflictions they have endured. The Mormon sect have been driven from point to point, and from state to state, until they were finally compelled to pass beyond the bounds of civilization in order to escape from those who pursued them with blood-hound hatred and revenge; but even in this wilderness to which they fled, and which they have redeemed from savage wildness and desolation, even here, their pursuers are found baying on their track and thirsting for fresh blood. These are only a few of the many variations, with which our ears are constantly regaled here, and they are offered simply as illustrations of the dire sufferings to which the faithful have been subjected, and not as comprehending, or by any means exhausting the list they have endured at the hands of their enemies. The object of these wallowing or howlings are palpable to any one at all conversant with the arts by which shrewd and cunning impostors contrive to cheat their followers, and to keep alive the prejudices and delusions they have implanted.

They would have them believe that all the rest of the world are their enemies, knowing if they can confirm this belief, they have succeeded in binding and riveting the fetters which they would impose, and that they can thereafter use them as obedient and submissive tools. Our ideas of what persecution is, may differ from those of many other persons here, and for fear they do, we will appeal to a common authority on the meaning and use of words. "Come down, Noah Webster! Come down from that shelf on which you have too long mouldered!" and enlighten us in regard to the use of this term. Well, here it is:—"The infliction of pain, punishment, or death on others unjustly, particularly for adhering to a religious creed or mode of worship, either by way of penalty or of compelling them to renounce their principles."

Such is Noah Webster's exposition of what persecution consists. And now we ask in all candor and sincerity, when, and where, the Mormons were either visited by pain, punishment, or death on account of their religious belief? If it be answered both in Missouri and Illinois, it will be very easy to prove that the troubles which they experienced in both these states, grew out of causes very different from any of a religious kind. We are not familiar with the difficulties, of causes which compelled the Mormons to leave Ohio, but we have been often told by persons familiar with the facts, and who could have no motive in misstating them, that when the Mormons first settled in Jackson County, Mo., there was, if not actual partiality for them, at least a general sympathy felt towards them, inasmuch as they were looked upon as a prescribed class who had been compelled to abandon their homes on account of their religion. This sympathy continued as long as the Mormons respected the rights which belonged to others, as well as to themselves; but when they assumed scriptural license for appropriating to themselves what belonged to others, and began to make forays upon the stock and other property belonging to other citizens not of their own sect, they became justly indignant and their partiality was very naturally changed into hatred and opposition, and this was the primary cause that led to their expulsion from Jackson County. They next settled in Caldwell, and Davis Counties in Missouri, and the people of these Counties, likewise, welcomed them to their midst as a class against whom prejudice had barred the door of justice.

But without profiting by the experience which they had gained in Jackson County, they soon resorted to their old tricks again, and either forgot or disregarded the rights of man and man. The consequence was that they were expelled from these counties as they had been from Jackson, but not still. Other force was resorted to, to compel them to leave, and till some blood had been shed on both sides. Their next location was at Nauvoo, and here again, we have been informed that they were received as an oppressed and persecuted band, but pity there as elsewhere, soon gave way to resentments for injuries received, and after the loss of their leading Prophet, his successor with his followers, after stopping for a short time in Iowa, where they escaped from the treatment which they had met with elsewhere, only because there were few inhabitants in the vicinity where they settled, whose rights they could invade, or property appropriate, the "Saints" finally left the borders of civilization and settled in this valley. What has been their course since they came here? Elsewhere their offences were such as mark, low and depraved natures that are incited more by avarice than by deep depravity or guilt. But here they have improved upon their first practices, and have added treason, rebellion, and murder to the petty vices and crimes before indulged in. Yet because the government of the United States seeks to maintain its authority and punish infractions of the constitution and laws, the same howl of "persecution" is sent up, that has been so often repeated against the people of Missouri and Illinois because they sought to preserve their stock and other property from rapine and confiscation. The cry in both cases is false and unfounded; the people of Missouri and Illinois were not hostile to the Mormons on account of their religion, nor is the government of the United States seeking in any way to oppress them because of it; and whenever Mormon leaders state to the contrary, they state what is false; and do it as has been said, for the purpose of confirming their own power over the simple and credulous masses, who compose a majority of the Mormon Church.

Neither the government of the United States, nor of any separate State or Territory in this Union, except Utah, that we are aware of, has ever sought to interfere with the rights of conscience, or of any man's belief on the subject of religion. True, there was a long time ago, away down east, where most of the Mormon dignitaries came from, a persecution carried on by a self-righteous and bigoted sect, against such as ventured to differ with them in belief; but this was discontinued long before the adoption of our present system of government, and was nowhere practised beyond New England. And thanks to the liberal and enlightened framers of our constitution, the right to establish any religion, or to prohibit the free exercise thereof, is strictly forbidden in that instrument.

But the persecutions to which we have referred in New England, are not to be likened to those carried on by the Mormons here. The Puritans banished good old Roger Williams from Massachusetts, because he was a Quaker, and they affixed the penalty of death to all Quakers who returned to the colony after being banished. This was most unjust, and a most unwarranted usurpation on the part of those who enacted such laws, but they are not equal in usurpation, or in atrocity, to the assumption by a body of men, calling themselves a church, of the power and duty of cutting a man's head off because he sees proper to renounce the creed he has professed. Yet, this power is not only assumed in theory, by the Mormon leaders, but has been openly proclaimed from their pulpits, and there is every reason to believe has been put into execution in the case of many an unfortunate apostate. Persecutions like this find a parallel only in the horrors of the Spanish Inquisition two centuries ago. Every civilized and semi-civilized nation on earth have long since banished all such barbarous rites and practices, and it is at once, the reproach of our age and nation, that they have been revived in a land boasting above others of its enlightenment, and perfect toleration in all matters of conscience and religion.

A large portion of our paper this week is devoted to an account of the recent riots at Harper's Ferry. The statement here given is as distinct as any that we have seen. In addition to the facts contained in it, we should state that Brown and the other conspirators who were not killed, have since been tried at Charlottesville, Va., the county seat of Jefferson county, and they have been severally found guilty of murder, treason, and the attempt to incite insurrection. They have all been sentenced to death, and the second day of December—last Friday—was the day fixed by the court for the execution of old Brown, the ringleader in the plot. It is thought in some quarters that Gov. Wise will commute his sentence to imprisonment for life. So far as Brown himself is concerned, this would be no doubt a greater punishment than his execution, as he no doubt would prefer death to imprisonment, believing that he would then be looked upon as a martyr to liberty. But with a crazy and desperate fanatic should be made an example of, and the effect upon others like him, will no doubt be greater to let him swing, and not to treat him as a king of England once did a rebel who tried to stir up sedition and treason in the kingdom for the sake of being put to death and being thought a martyr. As he seemed to labor hard to die, the king determined that he should not have the pleasure or the glory which he thought would result, and accordingly spared his life, although deserving death. Cook, one of the leading accomplices in the Harper's Ferry enterprise made his escape at first, but was subsequently arrested at Chambersburg, Pa., and subsequently delivered over on a requisition from the Governor of Virginia. His trial had not taken place at the time of our latest advices.

Yes, we have done it! we have! Yesterday we had the delightful pleasure of a good, old fashioned sleigh ride.

January and May went out together, and returned all the better for the trip. (Not the January and May that lately married in New York, and sung about by Mr. Stedman.)

Talk about the excitement of the chase, the spirit-stirring fife and drum, the baying of hounds, treed coons, the distilling business, practicing law, or editing a newspaper—what are they all, when compared to a seat in a sleigh, wrapped in buffalo robes, beside a bunch of live calves, drawn by four spirited John-horses, and a good Jehu and whipper-up? Ah! but wasn't it glorious. Plumb-cake and candy on Christmas never raised half the happy thoughts in the mind of a child that rushed up through our hat on yesterday. It reminded us of times long past, when a crowd of boys and girls used to be packed in a sleigh together, when we all sat upon fashions to keep warm, and thinking of dough-nuts, mince-pies, hand all round, and kiss the one that you like best. This may all be wrong, but we can't help it. We do like such things, and if our toes did get cold, and our nose a little red, we would be willing to endure ten times the inconvenience felt therefrom, and the detriment to our good looks, for a repetition of the pleasure felt. And we give notice now, that as soon as our paper is out, we will be found standing on the corner waiting for some one to ask us to pitch in and take another ride.

The Territorial Legislature will meet in this city on Monday next.

To Correspondents.

We have received during the past week, several well written communications on different subjects, which do not appear in our paper. The length of these communications in some instances, and the subject of them in others, prevent their insertion.

Among the communications received, is a quite lengthy and able article in regard to the Courts of this Territory, written partly in reply to a communication on the same subject, which appeared in a recent number of the "Mountaineer." If the writer of the article addressed to us will look in the Valley Tan of October 5th, he will find the same subject discussed in arguments very similar to those used by him. The jurisdiction of the different courts here, has also passed under the able review of Chief Justice Eckles, and he has made a decision in regard to the matter, which renders the whole subject one for acquiescence, rather than discussion.

Another communication on the subject of Mormon treason and rebellion, by "Veritas," is also omitted, believing the subject has been already quite thoroughly ventilated, however much it may have been neglected, and passed over by those whose duty it is to maintain the honor and dignity of the country.

The Temperance Movement at Camp Floyd.

A communication from Camp Floyd will be found in our paper, giving an account of the recent organization among the troops at that post, of a temperance society, or rather a lodge of the Sons of Temperance. We received with this communication, manuscript copies of two excellent addresses delivered by Messrs. Anderson and Worrall on the occasion of opening and inaugurating the new lodge which the "Sons" have erected at Camp Floyd. The length of these addresses alone prevents us from laying them before our readers. The new order, as will be seen from the letter of our correspondent, is rapidly increasing in numbers at the Camp, and we trust that the reformation and increase will go on till all are brought within its restraining and salutary influences. It gives us pleasure, at all times, to record the moral and social progress of any portion of our fellow citizens; and the temperance cause, particularly, is one that we feel both an interest and pride in promoting. We sometimes since seriously thought of trying to establish in this city an order similar to that which has proved so useful and successful at Camp Floyd. A philanthropic lady abroad, whose sympathies we suppose became enlisted, from hearing how extensively the vice of intemperance prevailed here, first suggested the proposition to us of trying to establish such an order, and at the same time, with a noble devotion to the cause herself, offered to procure for us a charter, and the proper regulations by which we could commence operations. Thus aided and encouraged, it was difficult for us to resist the effort of at least making an attempt at reformation here; but when we considered how little effect had resulted from our example in promoting temperance and sobriety in others, we despaired of any greater results from precepts on the subject, and was obliged from this belief, reluctantly to abandon our generous intentions.

But as we could not correct altogether the vices of our fellows, we at least aimed at ameliorating them; and accordingly have worked faithfully and energetically at reformation in the article, which they seemed bent on using. But alas! such is the depravity of man's nature, and the energy with which he clings to a vice once formed, even though it may be destructive in its effects, that he will pursue it even though a substitute is offered for it, which retains all its pleasures, without any of its deleterious effects. Our success thus far, has been partial in substituting a pure and healthy beverage in place of the poisonous drugs and compounds, which have been heretofore used; but we do not yet despair of good results from our effort. Let all remember that the "Mountain Dew," though not distilled directly from Heaven, is very elevating in its tendency, and is free from all poisonous and injurious substances; and moreover that it can be obtained from other orbs besides the "MOON." There is one that revolves a few miles from this city, on the road to Camp Floyd, for instance, that sheds down in profusion an excellent article.

COLD WEATHER.—We have had very cold weather here for a day or two past. Yesterday morning early, the mercury stood at 14 degrees in the thermometer, and some say that it went lower than that. It was but little above zero during the entire day. Snow fell on Saturday night and Sunday. The sleighing is fine and is being well improved. This morning the weather is much milder, and more snow is falling as we go to press.

We have been informed and requested to state through our paper, that a series of social parties will hereafter be held once a week at Independence Hall, in the building recently erected nearly opposite Miller, Russell & Co's store.

The first of these will take place on Friday evening, next. This announcement will afford pleasure to many citizens of our city, who, at present, are without engagements either of business or pleasure by which the long winter evenings can be passed or varied.

The proposed entertainments will, we hope, prove to be a source of unmixed pleasure to these and all others who may attend them.

An alarm of fire was made on East Temple street on Sunday evening last, just after dark. On entering the street a high blaze was seen issuing from the chimney of Messrs. Livingston, Bell & Co's store, having probably caught fire from the stove within the store. The wind was blowing quite hard at the time, and if the roof of the store had not been covered with snow, it would undoubtedly have caught fire, and the whole establishment probably consumed. As it was, no damage was done.

The Lexington (Mo.) Express, estimates the slaves that have been sold and taken out of that State within the past year, at $1,000,000. If this estimate is correct, it indicates something more than the gradual decline of the institution of slavery in Missouri, for at this rate of decrease, unless the importation of slaves counterbalances the number taken out, Missouri will soon cease to be more than nominally a slave State. Lafayette county, in which Lexington is situated, is among the richest and most extensive slaveholding counties in the State, and the condition of the institution there may be taken as a reliable index of what it is throughout the State. The Express attributes the removal of the slaves from the State to the formation of Kansas into a free State, and the insecurity of slave property in Missouri in consequence thereof.

Camp Floyd, U. T.

Nov. 30, 1859.
On Thursday, the 24th inst., we witnessed a sight which caused us to experience both pleasure and pride—a procession of the Military Order of the Sons of Temperance. It ought to be, and is, a subject of congratulation with all the friends of the army, that its members are the first who, in this Territory—this land of "Saints"—established a reformatory society for the moral and social regeneration of the many unfortunates addicted to the use of spirituous liquors. Its beneficial effects are already felt throughout Camp, and its complete success is a source of the highest gratification to the philanthropists who, despite the many difficulties which they have had to contend with, have succeeded in carrying out their humane ideas. We are morally certain that there are many who are now the victims of this most debasing of all vices, who will live to bless the men who established for them this ark of salvation, the Temperance Society.

About five months since twelve soldiers formed themselves into a society, and since that time their numbers have been constantly on the increase—at first slowly, but now they initiate between thirty and forty every week—and at present they number over two hundred. They have built a handsome lodge, and the procession of Thursday was on the occasion of its formal opening. As an evidence of their zeal, we may mention that on the day of their turn out the mud and around Camp was ankle deep. As usual, when an object is to be accomplished by which the soldier is certain to be benefited, the officers contributed handsomely to defray the expenses of the lodge.

After the return of the procession to the lodge, appropriate addresses were delivered by brothers Worrall, Anderson, and Cooper. We regret being unable to send you a copy of the last gentleman's address, but send you imperfect ones of the two former. If you have space, you would, considerably aid the cause, and receive the gratitude of the "Sons," by inserting them in your columns.

The length of these addresses, and the want of space alone prevent us from inserting them.—Ed. VALLEY TAN.

The days proceeding closed with a ball at which a large number of the "brave and the fair" attended, who did ample justice to the choice supper served on the occasion. The dancing was kept up until between four and five o'clock next morning, when all retired to their couches with the pleasing consciousness of having spent a happy night without the fear of awaking with a parched throat, sick head and feverish pulse, the sure attendants of a night of debauch.

Silk and satin, scarlet and velvet, put out the kitchen fire.

Letter From Senator Mason.

SALINA, NEAR WINCHESTER, (Va.)
Oct. 21, 1859.

To the Editor of the Constitution.
It is right, and due to truth, that the material facts attending the late incendiary attack on the town of Harper's Ferry should be correctly understood.

There was no insurrection, in any form whatsoever, on the part of any of the inhabitants or residents of the town or its vicinity. There is no doubt that such insurrection was fully expected by the leader of the armed miscreants who came from the adjoining State clandestinely, and under cover of night, into the town—an expectation in which they were fully disappointed, as fully admitted by themselves. The fact is undoubtedly that not a man, black or white, joined them after they came into Virginia, or gave them aid or assistance in any form.

It is true that after their capture their leader (Brown) stated that he had reason to expect such assistance, and had been disappointed. But this is fully discredited by the following facts:

First: That he had possession of the town from about midnight on Sunday until after midday on Monday, when the people of the adjoining county, learning the state of things, got together in armed bands and made a descent upon the town.

Second: That during this period they seized and held in custody, besides the slaves of Mr. Washington and Mr. Allstadt, taken in the neighborhood, some five or six other slaves belonging to residents at Harper's Ferry, and found in the streets. It is stated that they put spears or lances in the hands of two or three of these negroes and compelled them to stand in the character of sentinels at the door of the engine-house, occupied by the incendiaries, but at the first assault made by the citizens, the slaves threw away their pikes and escaped to their homes for refuge.

Third: They had in confinement, in addition, some thirty or forty other persons, who were found unarmed in the streets in the early hours of the morning, but no adherent or sympathizer turned up among them.

In addition to all this, after careful inquiry and investigation on the spot, I could not learn that any man of any color (save one, hereafter to be noticed) was even suspected of being in any way accessory or privy to the plot. The exception was of a man named Cook, who came to Harper's Ferry, a year or two since in the character of a schoolmaster, married there, and who, after the event, appeared, was an emissary of Brown, and had been associated with him in Kansas. Cook imparted the plans of Brown to none in Virginia, so far as is known; or, if he did, it is certain that none acted on them. He accompanied the party to Mr. Washington's, which seized him and his negroes and brought them off in the night, but none of the latter evinced any purpose, to follow his fortunes. On the contrary, those that he carried off the same night into Maryland escaped from him there and returned.

I think, I am warranted, on the foregoing facts, in the belief that no engagements or promise of aid from any, of any race, were given to Brown in inviting his descent. On the part of the negroes, it is certain that the only emotion evinced by them was of alarm and terror, and their only refuge sought at their masters' homes.

Of the conspiracy, outside of this State, enough has transpired, or been obtained from papers taken with Brown's effects, to show that he acted from impressions made upon him by abolition tracts, newspapers, and orators in the circles he frequented in the non-slaveholding States. Those impressions were that it required only to put arms within immediate reach to bring about immediate insurrection in the slaveholding States, a doctrine openly inculcated as is known, by the abolition leaders. Thus impressed, he embarked on this desperate enterprise, with but fifteen men; but he had arms and weapons secreted in the mountains and thinly populated country on the Maryland side of the river, and within four or five miles of the Virginia line at Harper's Ferry, with abundant ammunition, to have placed an effective weapon in the hands of each of at least fifteen hundred or two thousand men. The exact number of these arms can never be ascertained, as they were carried off in great numbers, when first discovered or brought in, by the citizens and companies of volunteers who came from a distance, and before possession of them was taken by the regular military authorities. Amongst them were one thousand picks or lances, composed of a steel blade sharpened at the point and at both edges, some six or eight inches long, and tapering from an inch or an inch and a half to the point, strongly and securely fixed on uniform wooden handles five or six feet in length—a most effective arm for hands unskilled in military weapons—leaving no doubt for whom they were destined.

The whole military equipment possessed by Brown and seized after his capture, could not have cost less than ten thousand dollars, consisting, among other things, of some two hundred Sharpe's rifles, with a like number of six-shooter pistols, contained in the manufacturer's boxes and not yet used a proportionate supply of fixed ammunition for the rifles, with caps, &c. in the original boxes, pick-axes and shovels, unstained with use, and a large box containing the keys of powder.

A grave inquiry remains, which will be diligently, and I trust successfully, prosecuted—to ascertain whence the funds were derived for this military expedition of outlays against a State of the Union, and who they were aiding with money to furnish arms to such a leader for such a purpose.

It remains only to add, that, so far as can be discovered, not one of the nineteen escaped. I could not correctly ascertain the number killed—some ten or eleven it is known were killed—some were shot in attempting to escape across the river, and their bodies not recovered; five only were captured alive, amongst them their leader, Brown; two of the five are negroes; one, a mulatto, reports that he came from Ohio to join this expedition; the other a black, says that he came from Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, with the like purpose; both allege that they were deceived by Brown as to the objects of the expedition.

Not a slave escaped or attempted to escape during the tumult. Of the few carried off by Cook across the river all escaped from him and came safely back but one, who it appears was drowned whilst crossing the river homeward bound.

Very respectfully, yours,

J. M. MASON.

COL. WASHINGTON'S STATEMENT.

Col. Lewis W. Washington (who is great nephew to George Washington) gives the following account of his arrest and imprisonment:

Between one and two o'clock on Sunday night I was in my bed at my house, five or six miles from Harper's Ferry. I was awakened by hearing my name called in the hall. I supposed it was some friends arrived, who, being acquainted with the house, had come in through the kitchen without making any noise. I got up and opened the door into the hall, and before me stood four men, three armed with sharp's rifles leveled and cocked, and the fourth—this man Stevens—with a revolver in his right hand, and in his left a lighted flambeau, made of pine whittlings. As I opened the door one of the men said, "Is your name Washington?" I said "that is my name." Perhaps Cook, who was one of the crowd, also identified me, as he told me afterwards he was taken there for that purpose. I was then told that I was a prisoner, and one of them said, "Don't be frightened." I replied, "Do you see any thing that looks like a fight about me?" "No," he said, "I only want to say that if you surrender and come with us freely you are safe." I told them I understood that sufficiently, and there was no necessity for further explanation. But I was struck with the number of men sent against me, and asked what need there was of so many, as there was no danger of an unarmed man in his night shirt resisting an armed force. I was told to put on my clothes, of course complied. "Perhaps," said I, "while I am dressing, you will be so good as to tell me what all this means?" Inquired what the weather was outside, and one of them advised me to put on an overcoat, as it was rather chilly. Another said they wanted my arms, and I opened the gun chest for them to help themselves. They then explained their mission, which they represented to be purely philanthropic—to wit, the emancipation of all the slaves in the country.

After I was dressed Stevens said to me, "Have you got any money?" I replied, "I wish I had a great deal." "Be careful, sir," said he.

I told him if I had any money I knew how to take care of it, and he could not get it. Said he, "Have you a watch?" My reply was, "I have but you cannot have it. You have set yourselves up as great moralists and liberators of slaves; now it appears that you are robbers as well."

"Be careful, sir," said he again. I told them I was dressed and ready to go. They bade me wait a short time and my carriage would be at the door. They had ordered my carriage for me, and pried open the stable door to get it out. They had harnessed the horses on the long side of each other, and I tried to induce them to correct the mistake, which they did after driving a short distance; but still, being harnessed wrong, and rather spirited animals, they would not work well. My servant, whom they had forced along, was driving. I suspected they were only robbers, and was expecting all along that they would turn off at some point, but they drove directly to the Armory.

Brown came out and invited me in, saying there was a comfortable fire, and I shortly afterwards met with Mr. Allstadt, whom they had arrested on the way, and brought along in my buggy wagon. While coming along, the horses being restive, I got out and walked up a hill with one of the men, who took occasion to ask my views on the subject of slavery in the abstract. I declined an argument on the subject, but he still pressed it upon me, and I was obliged to refuse the second time.

Brown told us to make ourselves comfortable, and added, "By and by I shall require each of you, gentlemen, to write to some of your friends to send a stout negro man in your places." This was by way of ransom. He told us he must see the letter before it was sent, and he thought after this was effected, they could make an arrangement by which we could return home. I determined in my own mind not to make the requisition, but he never made application for it, having other matters before the day expired attracting his attention.

My sword, which had been presented by Frederick the Great to General Washington, was taken from my house, with other arms. This man Cook had been at my house some time before and seen the arms and at that time I beat him at shooting, and he told me I was the best shot he had ever met. On the way to Harper's Ferry he asked me if I had shot any since that time, and said he would give me an apology for being with this party after being so well treated by me. I told him that it was of no consequence about the apology, but I would ask one favor of him, which was to use his influence to have returned to me the old sword and an old pistol which, in the present improved state of arms, were only valuable in consideration of their history. He promised to attend to it, and shortly after reaching the Armory I found this sword in old Brown's hands. Said Brown, "I will take especial care of it; and I shall endeavor to return it to you after you are released." He carried the sword in his hands all day Monday, until after the arrival of the military.

Upon the first announcement of the arrival of the militia Brown came into the room and picked out ten of us whom he supposed to be the most prominent men. He told us we might be assured of good treatment, because, in case he got the worst of it in this fight, the possession of us would be of service in procuring good terms; we could exercise great influence with our fellow-citizens; and as for me, he knew if I was out I should do my duty, and in my position as aid to the Governor I should be a most dangerous foe. Then we were taken into the engine-house and closely confined. Two of our number went backwards and forwards repeatedly to confer with citizens during the furious negotiations, and finally remained out altogether, leaving the eight who were inside when the building was finally assaulted and captured by the marines.

During Monday various terms of capitulation were proposed and refused, and at night we requested our friends to cease firing during night, as, if the place should be stormed in the dark, friends and foes would have to share alike. In the morning Col. Shriver, of Frederick, announced the arrival of the United States Marines. During the night he had brought in Dr. Tyler, of Frederick, to look at the wounds of old Brown's son. The surgeon looked at the man and promised to attend him in the morning if practicable, but about the time he was expected hostilities had recommenced.

Col. Lee, who commanded the United States forces, sent up Lieut. Stuart to announce to Brown that the only terms he would offer for surrender were that he and his men should be taken to a place of safety and kept unmolested until the will of the President could be ascertained. Brown's reply was to the effect that he could expect no leniency, and he would sell his life as dearly as possible. A few minutes later the place was assaulted and taken.

In justice to Brown, I will say that he advised the prisoners to keep well under shelter during the firing, and at no time did he threaten to massacre us or place us in front in case of assault. It was evident he did not expect the attack so soon. There was no cry of "surrender" in his party except from one young man, and then Brown said "only one surrenders." This fellow, after he saw the Marines, said he would prefer to take his chance of a trial at Washington. He had taken his position and fired one or two shots when he cried "surrender." There were four of Brown's party able to fight when the Marines attacked, besides a negro, making five in all. This negro was very bold at first, but when the assault was made he took off his accoutrements and tried to mingle with the prisoners, and pass himself off as one of them. I handed him over to the Marines at once, saying he was a prisoner then at all events.

The Citizens of Virginia who were killed at Harper's Ferry.

A correspondent of a Baltimore paper gives the following account of the killing of the citizens at Harper's Ferry, by the insurgents:

ADDITIONAL DETAILS FROM OUR OWN REPORTER—THE MURDERED CITIZENS.

Thomas Burley was a respected citizen of the Ferry, an Irishman by birth, but for many years a resident of that place. On Monday morning, when the insurgents were in possession of the arsenal, he with a few others, was in favor of attacking them, but enough of men could not be raised to ensure the success of the assault. He however, loaded his gun, and every opportunity which offered, he attempted to shoot down the insurgents. At the time he was killed, he had left his home a few minutes before by a neighbor, Mr. Thomas Kelley—with the intention of trying to shoot one of the rebels. Kelley had fired at a mulatto who was walking guard in front of the arsenal, and some of the shot with which the gun was loaded took effect on the negro, but did not injure him severely. They walked down High street to the intersection of Shepandoah street. The mulatto was still on guard, and he must have been aware of the approach of Burley and Kelley; for the moment the person of Mr. Burley was exposed around the corner, the negro fired, and the ball passed through the body of Mr. Burley, near the heart, and he fell and expired.

George W. Turner, Esq., was next killed. Mr. Turner lived five miles south of Charlesown, and thirteen miles from the Ferry. He heard of the insurrection, and immediately ordered his horse and gun, which were brought out by a favorite servant, and he started for the scene. He entered the Ferry through the town of Bolivar, over Camp Hill, and down High street. He was riding leisurely along, while the inhabitants warned him of the danger he was approaching, which he listened to, but still rode on. As he was passing down High street, and when near the intersection of Shepandoah street, a bullet from a Sharp's rifle struck him on the side, passing through his body, and he fell mortally wounded. He lived about three-quarters of an hour after being shot. Mr. Turner was one of the most prominent and influential citizens of Jefferson county. He was a graduate of West Point, and after spending a few years in the army service, he resigned his commission and retired to his farm, (his father having died and left him the home estate of the Turners.) Here he lived a most useful citizen, a kind master, respected and honored by his fellow citizens and loved by his servants. His death will be lamented by the entire community. He was a brave, generous man, and was known far and near for his strict honesty and unblemished honor.

At three o'clock in the afternoon Fountain Beckham, Esq., was killed. Early in the morning he had gone to his office, where he remained during the day. He had warned many of his friends during the morning to keep in doors. At the hour named he left his office, walked along the railroad platform in a western direction until he reached the water-tank, (the house farthest west marked in the diagram.) He stopped for a moment to converse with some men who were sheltered by this house, and in an unguarded moment he exposed his person, when a shot fired from the engine house from a Sharp's rifle, struck him near the shoulder blade and passed through his body. He staggered a few steps west, fell and died almost instantly. His body was lying so far west that it was impossible to reach it, unless the person doing so was fully exposed to the deadly fire of the insurgents in the engine house. The body was accordingly allowed to lay for a considerable length of time, when a citizen removed it to his office, where it lay during the night. Mr. Beckham was more widely personally known than any other man in Jefferson county. He had been the agent of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad from the time the road was constructed, and had discharged his duties in the most satisfactory manner. He had been a Justice of the Peace for Jefferson county for over twenty years, and at the time of his death was Mayor of Harper's Ferry.

The negro Hayward was in the employ of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, and in the morning when the insurgents had possession of the bridge, he was active in his efforts to secure a passage of the express train of cars which had been stopped. Conductor Phelps, with his baggage-master, not aware that there was armed men in the bridge, lamp in hand, (it was not yet daylight,) started through the bridge to see that the timbers were all safe, and the rails of the track had not been removed. He had not progressed but a short distance, when he was commanded to halt, and on raising his lamp, found that he was confronted by four armed men, who ordered him back. He of course returned, and as he left the mouth of the bridge a shot was fired at the baggage-master, who was behind Captain Phelps. Fortunately it did not take effect. A short time afterward, Hayward took his shoes from his feet, and though he could creep across the bridge without being heard, but in the attempt he was discovered and shot. He was a faithful and kind servant, and refused to be armed, although Brown's men had endeavored to force a pike into his hand.

The Carson Valley Mines.

The correspondent of the Sacramento Union, under date of Oct. 22, wrote thus in regard to the recently discovered mines in Carson Valley:

"In regard to the richness and extent of the mines hereabouts you doubtless hear many exaggerated stories. That a very rich lode of silver has been found at this point admits of no question. How extensive, or lasting it will prove remains to be determined. As yet it has actually been traced but a few hundred feet, not more than five or six altogether. For this distance, however, it probably surpasses in richness anything recorded in the history of mining. Already many thousands of dollars have been taken from three or four excavations, neither of them hardly the size of an ordinary apartment. To convey to you some idea, however, of this locality and the surrounding districts, wherein hundreds of men are now prospecting, many of them with success, I will give you a brief description of its mining topography, with such additional remarks as may seem pertinent to the subject.

"By looking at Goddard's map of California, you will see a place thereon designated 'Gold Canon.' It is a small ravine, heading in what is termed the eastern summit of the Sierra Nevada; and extends nine miles in a southeast direction to Carson river, which stream it touches at Chinatown, a mining hamlet twenty-five miles north of Genoa. At the mouth of this canon is an extensive flat, on which more or less mining has been done every Spring since '62, gold having been discovered here as early as '49. For a year or two this flat and the ravine for several miles above paid good wages; and they would have been extensively worked, being the first point on the immigrant trail where gold in paying quantities has been found; only that there was insufficient water, except in the Spring, for washing even with a rocker. Some seasons there is only for a short time enough for this, the total of wet weather in this region often amounting to less than a week throughout the entire year. Lately a small ditch has been completed, bringing water from Carson river, whereby some fifty or sixty men are secured steady employment. Of this number about forty are Chinamen, who, having been here several years, and being the only people of this race on this side the mountains, are suffered, notwithstanding they occupy many of the best claims; to remain without molestation. They mostly work with rockers, and make two or three dollars a day to the man; parties having sluices do better.

Last Spring, some miners prospecting about the head of this canon discovered, around the base of a small rocky knoll a good deal of rich quartz. Into this eminence, since called Gold Hill, a large number of tunnels and cuts have been made, yielding great quantities of rich rock and pay dirt. The latter is washed in rockers, sufficient water being obtained from the excavations for this purpose. It has afforded good, and, in many instances, large wages. Part of the quartz is crushed on the spot in arrastras, and part carried to Chinatown, eight miles below, where two mills have been erected on the river. One of these, owned by Logan and Holmes, consists of four stampers driven by horse power; the other, a very substantial work, owned by Hastings, Woodworth & Co., is propelled by water. It operates arrastras and crushes from five to six tons per day. The quartz reduced at these mills has yielded $40 to the ton. That crushed at the mines has generally proved richer. It is easily obtained, much of it being near the surface; and a good road having been constructed, two yoke of oxen will haul fifty hundred pounds to the mills per day. This road, on which a small toll is charged, has been built at a cost of $7,000, and is a great public convenience, at the same time that it promises to prove remunerative to the enterprising owners.

A few months after the finding of this quartz at Gold Hill, a party, while working up a small gulch at the head of Six Mile Canon, struck the vein of silver which has since proved so rich, and attracted so much attention. This ravine, which heads but a couple of miles north of, and runs nearly parallel with, Gold Canon, is so called because it reaches the sage plains six miles below the latter. Some mining has been done along it for several years past. The gold obtained, however, has been of low standard value, being largely admixed with silver. The point where the silver lode was first struck, and where the rich ore is now being taken out, is situated one mile and a half north of Gold Hill, about half way up the side of the east summit of Sierra, which here has a gentle slope, and at an elevation of about 2,000 feet above Carson river, from which it is distant, due west, eight miles.

"Since the discovery of silver at this point the locality has undergone various changes of name, which has led to some confusion in the public mind as to its exact position. After the happening of that important event, the place being deemed worthy a name more significant of its promised wealth, was baptized 'Ophir,' by which term it is generally designated hereabouts to this day. At a meeting held on the spot some month or two since it was determined to call it 'Virginatown,' in honor of the original discoverer. Not that this was the veritable patronymic of that personage; or indicative of his immaculate virtue, but simply because he, happening to be a native of the 'Old Dominion,' had come to be generally known and designated as 'Old Virginia.' His real name is James Finny, and I regret to say that about the only benefit he is likely to realize from his famous discovery is the equivocal honor of having the spot named after his native State.

Finny, not aware of the value of the lead when he came upon it, sold out his interest for $45, taking his pay in superannuated horseflesh, and lightning whisky. The purchasers, consisting of six or eight persons, took up 400 feet of ground, and one of their number, being named Comstock, the mine afterwards came to be known as the 'Comstock Lead.' It has also been called the Washoe mine from the belief abroad that it was situated in the valley bearing that name. This, however, is not the case, the east summit of the Sierra, with a space of ten miles, being interposed between them. Lately I have heard the elevation upon which this mine is situated called 'Silver Hill,' a very beautiful and appropriate name, not only because of its signifi cancy but also as contradicting it from 'Gold Hill' near by, and hence I have adopted the term in this present writing.

Having thus alluded to the origin of this discovery, and given to this celebrated spot 'a local habitation and a name,' I must reserve a further description of it, as well as of the adjacent mineral districts, for a future occasion, observing, in conclusion, that parties coming to this place from California will find the following the best routes for reaching it: Those starting from Stockton should come by way of the 'Big Trees'—entire distance about 130 miles. Those starting from Sacramento or vicinity should come by Placerville and Lake valley—distance, 150 miles. Those starting from Marysville will take the Truckee route—distance something further than from Sacramento. Silver Hill is 30 miles north of Genoa; 15 north of Carson City; 25 northeast of Lake Bigler; 10 east of Washoe valley (25 by the wagon road); 10 north of Chinatown, and the same distance southeast of Steamboat valley, of all which localities I will have something to say in my subsequent letters. H. D.

COMMENTS OF THE PRESS.—The Washington Constitution indulges at length in some serious reflections, and then very pertinently asks:

"If the scenes at Harper's Ferry, which have given occasion to these reflections, had occurred at a time when Mr. Seward occupied the Presidential chair, what would have been the result? With his avowed doctrines of the 'higher law' and the 'irrepressible conflict,' and his equally emphatic announcement that 'slavery can and must be abolished, and you (addressing himself to the Northern people) and I must do it,' in connection with his denial of the constitutional guarantees of slavery—with these principles, views and doctrines, what, we ask, would have been the course of Mr. Seward if he had been President at this critical juncture? There can be but one answer to the inquiry. He must either have been false to all his own professions, or false to the Constitution and laws of the land. With such a man in the Presidential chair to stimulate by his example and teachings the spirit of rebellion and treason, and to withhold from the support of the law the strong arm of the military, what would there be left but anarchy, blood and revolution."

The Fillibusters.

Some of the leading fillibusters are on trial at New Orleans. The Delta describes them as follows:

Sailor Fayoux is a small, handsome, wiry sailor looking young man, a native of this city, of creole blood. He is a sharp, quick and sagacious gentleman, and is the same officer who performed the gallant exploit on Lake Nicaragua of blowing up the principal vessels of the Nicaraguans, armed with large cannons, and a force of several hundred sailors and soldiers, with a little schooner of less than a hundred tons.

Capt. Harry Maury of Mobile, a fine looking young man, of the distinguished Virginia family of Maury's, is the dash ing officer who, in command of the vessel which carried Walker out of Mobile on his last expedition, escaped from the United States revenue cutter, and safely landed Walker's party.

Col. Frank Anderson is a tall, military looking young man, of very impressive bearing, the same who, with a small party in advance of Walker's main force, took the Fort Castillo, in the last expedition, which he was afterwards compelled to evacuate on account of the capture of Walker's party by the United States naval force under Commodore Paulding. Col. Anderson came into court with a smiling face, bearing a huge bouquet presented to him by some lady friends on his way to the court, which he quietly deposited in a tumbler on the table.

Capt. Scott is another of Walker's veterans—a sedate, grave-looking young man, whose acts have proved what his countenance indicates—the possession of decided military talent.

These gentlemen were accompanied by their friends, among whom we observed quite prominent in the manifestation of their sympathies for the accused, Col. Ben Harrison, the independent candidate for the Sheriffalty, and Recorder Lucien Adams, of the Fourth District. General Walker was not present at the examination.

plunged into the river. One of the soldiers was about ten feet behind; the man turned round, threw up his hands, and said, "Don't shoot." The soldier fired, and the man fell into the water, with his face blown away. His coat skirts were cut from his person, and in the pockets was found a captain's commission. To Capt. W. H. Leeman from the Provisional Government. The commission was dated October 15, 1859, and signed by John Brown, Commander-in-Chief.

A party of five of the insurgent army, with Minnie rifles, and posted in the rifle armory, were expelled by the Charlestown Guards. They all ran for the river, and one, who was unable to swim, was drowned. The other four swam out to the rocks in the middle of the Shenandoah and fired upon the citizens and troops upon both banks. This drew upon them the muskets of between two and three hundred men, and not less than four hundred shots were fired at them from Harper's Ferry, about two hundred yards distant. One was finally shot dead.

The second, a negro, attempted to jump over the dam, but fell shot, and was not seen afterwards. The third was badly wounded, and the remaining one was taken unharmed. The white insurgent was wounded and captured, died a few moments after in the arms of our informant. He was shot through the breast, arm, and stomach. He declared there were only nineteen whites engaged in the insurrection.

For nearly an hour a running and random firing was kept up by the troops against the rioters. Several were shot down, and many managed to limp away wounded. During the firing the women and children ran shrieking in every direction, but when they learned that the soldiers were their protectors they took courage, and did good service in the way of preparing refreshments and attending the wounded.

Aaron D. Stevens, a captain of the rioters, shot at the bridge, was taken into the Carroll Hotel, where his dreadful wounds were dressed by Dr. McGarrity. Heavy bullets passed through his head, breast, and one arm. He said to those around him that, as he expected to die before morning, he wanted somebody to telegraph to his father, at Norwich, Connecticut, to say that his son died at Harper's Ferry, in an attempt at high treason against the State of Virginia. He was alive at four o'clock Tuesday morning.

INCIDENTS OF THE SECOND CONFLICT.
The special reporter of the same paper furnishes a detailed account of the storming of the arsenal, from which we make the following extracts:

HARPER'S FERRY, October 18, 1859.
The town of Harper's Ferry was thronged last night with military and rioters, and martial law prevailed throughout the entire community. No one could pass the bridge without arrest, unless permitted by Col. Shriver, commanding the Federal military. This precaution was taken to prevent the possibility of escape of any of the disturbers of the town.

The citizens have not yet recovered from their astonishment at the civil war which has so suddenly been engendered in their peaceful community, nor the surprise at the boldness and audacity which characterized the efforts of the conspirators who have so mysteriously alighted, full armed, in their midst. The insurgents are caged, however, after their work of violence and death, and the people with great anxiety awaited the results of the events of the day.

At about 5 o'clock yesterday morning the military companies, a part of which had been on duty at guard during the night, were ordered out. The volunteers took possession of the streets surrounding the Government buildings, and cleared them of spectators. The marines were drawn up within the enclosure, under the command of Col. Lee, Lieut. Stewart, of the army, and Major Russell, with their two Dahlgren 12 pound howitzers.

The insurgents were in the engine-room of the armory, a small building at the extreme end of the Government works. They held as their prisoners some half-dozen citizens of wealth and respectability, and some half-dozen negroes. One of the Baltimore companies (the Independent Greys, Lieut. Simpson commanding) occupied the railroad bridge, directly in front of the occupied buildings.

The military companies of the adjoining towns and the Baltimore companies presented an imposing military display. The scene was exciting in the extreme. The most breathless suspense existed for the half-hour which preceded the attack. Death was anticipated, and the reckless daring of the few bold and foolish fanatics who set at defiance the authority of the General Government and the whole military force in their view, created an intense indignation and a desire for their summary chastisement. The apprehensions for the safety of the gentlemen detained in the custody of the insurgents were also painful.

The marines, in this yard commenced maneuvering towards a close proximity to the building. At length Col. Lee appeared in front of the enclosure with Lieut. Stewart, who, with a citizen, was supposed to bear a flag of truce to the insurgents. Every eye was upon the building, as they approached the door of the building. The conference was long, especially between the insurgents and the citizen, and the patience of all present was nearly exhausted. At length they retired. It was understood that Col. Lee in summoning them to surrender, offered them protection till the pleasure of the President of the United States should be made known, and that nearly all the insurgents were in favor of accepting these conditions, but the powerful will of the leader, Brown, overruled their wishes, and they refused to surrender.

Major Russell then ordered Lt. Green, with a file of marines, to force the large double doors. They rushed towards them, and attempted with their bayonets to force them open, but the strength of their fastenings defied the effort. At this time a volley from within increased the excitement of the spectators. The marines then tried to force the doors with heavy sledge-hammers, but they also proved ineffectual. A double file of marines was then ordered to attack the doors with a heavy ladder. A few powerful efforts shattered the strong doors of this out-house of the Government, which was filled with fire-engines, and as they yielded to the force of this battering-ram and flew in pieces an extra about went up from the multitude. The moment the upper part of the doors went down Lieut. Green and his marines fired a volley into the insurgents with deadly aim. Major Russell then sprang upon the ladder and preceded them. The conflict was terminated in a few minutes. One of the marines, private Quinn, was borne off fatally wounded by a shot in the abdomen, and another private, Rupert, received a flesh wound in the upper lip, and had one or more of his upper teeth knocked out.

The imprisoned citizens, whose names have been mentioned, then rushed out, and leaving the enclosure were greeted most warmly by their friends, some of them having been confined since Sunday evening last.

Two white insurgents were brought out as prisoners, one named Watson Brown, a son of the leader of the insurgents, who was in a very helpless condition from wounds received on Monday, and another named Edwin Coppes, of Iowa, who was uninjured. A free negro from Harriburg, named Shields Green, a somewhat notorious character, was also arrested. Four or five other negroes were also taken out of the engine-house, who were known to be slaves belonging to the neighborhood, and supposed to have been forcibly detained.

Several of the insurgents had been killed in the assault by the marines, and the most painful and exciting act in the tragedy was the bringing out of the dead bodies. Five of them lay upon the grass, one named John C. Anderson in the last agonies of dissolution; another, the leader, the older Brown, with a heavy gash upon his forehead, and three other wounds upon his body, supposed to be mortal, but still calm and collected, and conversing intelligently, without an indication of emotion of pain, and answering all the questions of the crowd about him. Another son of the leader, named Brown, was taken out stark and cold, he having been killed the day previous. Stewart Taylor, also killed instantly by a ball through his head and one through his body, and Albert Hazlett, killed instantly. The wounds were shocking to behold, and all were weltering in blood.

The writer had a conversation with the dying man, Anderson. He said that the older Brown had been their leader, and he had always looked up to him as a great man. A letter was found in his of Chillicothe, stating that J. C. Anderson, of his last letter upon the question of slavery were "devoured with eagerness."

Upon the body of Hazlett was found a lock of his wife's hair and a piece of her dress. Upon the person of the leader, the notorious "Ossawatimie Brown," of Kansas, was found by one of the volunteer surgeons of the division, Dr. McLaughlin, the sum of $305 in gold, which was handed by him over to Major Russell, of the marine corps. In a conversation with the writer as he lay weltering in his blood, he stated that he had figured in Kansas, and was known as "Ossawatimie Brown," or "Old Brown." He had a son killed in Kansas, (as well as two here). He hated slavery, and he desired to avenge his son's death. His confederates desired to surrender when they were summoned by Col. Lee; but he refused because he did not believe the General Government would slaughter his companions for the sake of killing him. He had always treated his prisoners with courtesy. The prisoner Edwin Coppes, upon being asked what he expected would be his fate, said that he only asked his country to give him a fair trial and he would abide the consequences. He manifested no concern or apprehension with respect to his punishment. The prisoner Brown, son of the leader, was too debilitated from his wounds to realize his situation.

The wounded have been removed to the hospital of the arsenal, including the rioter A. D. Stevens. He is reported to be mortally wounded; but it is thought by some that his four wounds are not fatal. When the crisis of the engagement arrived even the outside military and citizens could hardly restrain themselves from rushing forward and discharging their arms. Loud cries of order arrested their impulses. When the prisoners came out there were vociferous cries of "hang them," constantly repeated.

About the middle of the stream of the broad Potomac lies the body of one of the insurgents named William H. Leeman, who was shot on Monday, while attempting to escape from the town. His black hair may just be seen floating upon the surface of the water and waving with every ripple. The visitors, upon the discovering the body to-day, saluted it with a shower of balls, but the action was one of very questionable taste and propriety. He was honored with the commission of captain from Mr. Brown, the following being a true copy of the document found in his pocket:

HEADQUARTERS WAR DEPT., Near Harper's Ferry, Md.
Whereas W. H. Leeman has been nominated a captain in the army established under the Provisional Constitution, now, therefore, in pursuance of the authority vested in me by said constitution, we do hereby appoint and commission the said Wm. H. Leeman captain.

Given at the office of the Secretary of War, this day, 15th of October, 1859.
JOHN BROWN,
Commander-in-Chief.
H. KEYS, Secretary War.

There was taken from the person of Stevens a printed pamphlet of twenty-five pages, containing the constitution, &c., of Mr. Brown's provisional government. The work is in the possession of Col. Lee, and would be treasonable were it not too ridiculous.

This extraordinary movement at Harper's Ferry on the part of the Abolitionist Brown, characterized by such audacity and folly, is fertile of comment. It appears that he was a monomaniac, possessing a strong will, superior firmness, and resources of mind, and that his follows possessed a weakness of mind and character which enabled him to obtain that ascendancy over them which led to their destruction.

KILLED AND WOUNDED.
The following are among the killed and wounded in the recent conflicts at Harper's Ferry:

Killed.—Fountain Beckham, railroad agent, on Sunday, by a single shot; Hayard Sheppard, colored porter at the railroad station, killed Sunday night in working at the train; Thomas Boerly, grocer, of Harper's Ferry, killed in Monday's assault; Wm. Richardson, of Martinsburg, killed in the same assault; George W. Turner, of Charlestown military, killed on Monday also; Wm. Brown, son of "Old Brown," Stewart Taylor, insurgent; J. C. Anderson, insurgent; W. H. Leeman, insurgent; Albert Hazlett, insurgent; and several colored men.

Wounded.—Ossawatimie (old) Brown; Watson Brown, a second son; Evans Dorey, mortally; Allen Evans, mortally; Private Quinn, U. S. Marines, mortally; another Marine, name unknown, slightly; Alex. Kelly; Geo. Murphy, State's Attorney, of Martinsburg.

Taken Prisoners.—Edwin Coppes, of Iowa; Shields Green, colored, of Harriburg; Watson Brown, a son of old Brown.

ADVICE TO YOUNG LADIES.—Some time since the Marysville Express made the following announcement: One hundred and fifty marriageable girls, all represented to be young and pretty, have lately arrived from across the Plains and settled down in Honey Lake Valley. Bachelors should make a note of it.

Upon reading the above, the editor of the Northern Californian, published at Union, Humboldt county, expatiated as follows:

Proposals for the odd fifty have been received at this office. There is a land beyond the mountains, O, ye fair daughters of the plain, where the young men abound in wisdom, and are exceedingly comely. Virtue is theirs, and the cedars of Lebanon excel them not in vigor. Skill and cunning abideth with them; they put their hands to the "keeds" and lo! the Jack turneth. From them seven up is not hid, neither is poker forgotten. They knoweth the horse the chariot, and their driving is as their apparel; and their raiment is purple and red (flannel). Fair are the valleys of Honey Lake, O, ye daughters of Pike, but the valleys of Humboldt are fairer.

OBSTINATE ABOLITIONISM.—So embittered is Oberlinism to anything Southern that at one time the faculty and students resolved to use no produce of slave labor; of course they cut cotton and eschewed tobacco altogether. An ardent young student, deeply imbued with this anti-slavery sentiment, happened to think one night, after retiring to bed, that he was between a pair of cotton sheets. Out he jumped, took a blanket, and slept on the floor until morning. It was rather a hard bed, but it was better to rest little, and turn over often, than to snooze all night in the sweat of a negro. Upon waking up in the morning, he found that the carpet on which he had slept was half cotton.

The N. O. Picayune tells a pointed anecdote of a minister in Minnesota, who was noted for combining the somewhat incongruous profession of a preacher and money-lender. He was proffering a prayer one Sabbath from his pulpit, in which was the following petition:

"Grant, O, Lord, that we have more interest in heaven" when, to the surprise of all, one of the congregation exclaimed, "Don't do it! don't do it! The old sinner gets five per cent, a month now; and that's enough, the Lord knows."

A celebrated poet at one time advertised that he would supply lines for any occasion. A fisherman sought him shortly after, and "wanted a line strong enough to catch a porpoise."

Some people take cold easily, Howard Paul, in his amusing "Patchwork," tells of a delicate young man who kissed a lady's "snowy brow," and was laid up with the influenza a week in consequence.

Charles Lamb is reported to have perpetrated the following: "The water-cure is neither new nor wonderful, for it is as old as the deluge, which, in my opinion, killed more than it cured."

"Steel your heart," said an ex-President to his son (who was going to Europe); "you are now going among some of the most fascinating of the fair sex." "I had much rather steal theirs," said the promising youth.

The Best Judge.—A judge and a joking lawyer were conversing about the doctrine of transmigration of the souls of men into animals. "Now," said the judge, "suppose you and I were turned into a horse and an ass, which would you prefer to be?"

"The ass, to be sure," replied the lawyer.

"Why?" asked the judge. "Because," was the reply, "I have heard of an ass being judge, but a horse never!"

Never butt your head against a badpost to see which is the hardest—it is folly.

"Union is not always strength," as the sailor said when he saw the purser mixing rum with water.

A boy was asked one day what made him so dirty, and his reply was, "I am made, so they tell me, of the dust of the ground, and I reckon it's just working out."

THE MAN WHO LOVES HIS FELLOW-MEN.—The King of the Cannibal Islands.

"There is two ways of doing it," said Pat to himself, as he stood musing and waiting for a job on the State street corner. "If I save me $4,000, I must lay up $200 a year for twenty years, or I can put away $20 a year for 200 years. Now which way will I do it?"

TAKE NOTICE.

WE hereby forewarn all persons against the purchase or negotiation of a certain note dated at Chicago, Illinois, on the 26th day of March, 1859, for the sum of three thousand dollars, and the costs of collection. Said note is signed by us, and is made payable to the order of Peter Schutler, but the consideration thereof having failed, we do not intend to pay the same.

The Bartlett-Oviedo Wedding.

THE DIMOND-WEDDING.

BY E. C. STEEDMAN.

O, Level Level! Level what times were those,
Long ere the age of belles and beaux,
And Brussels lace and silken hose,
When in the green Arcadian close,
You married Psyche under the rose,
With only the grass for bedding!
Heart to heart and hand in hand,
You followed nature's sweet command—
Roaming lovingly through the land,
Nor sighed for a diamond wedding.

So have we read in classic Ovid,
How Hero watched for her beloved,
Impassioned youth, Leander,
She was the fairest of the fair,
And wrapt him round with her golden hair,
Whenever he landed cold and bare,
With nothing to eat and nothing to wear,
And wetter than any gander;
For Love was Love, and better than money—
The slyer the theft, the sweeter the honey—
And kissing was clover, all the world over,
Wherever Cupid might wander.

So thousands of years have come and gone,
And still the moon is shining on,
Still Hyacinth's torch is lighted;
And hitherto, in this land of the West,
Most couples in love have thought it best
To follow the ancient way of the rest,
And quietly get united.

But now, True Love were growing old—
Bought and sold with silver and gold,
Like a house or a horse and carriage,
Midnight talks,
Moonlight walks,
The glance of the eye and sweetheart's sigh,
And shadowy haunts with no one by,
I do not wish to disparage;
But every kiss
Has a price for its bliss,
In the modern code of marriage;
And the compact sweet
Is not complete,
Till the high contracting parties meet
Before the altar of Mammon;
And the bride must be led to a silver bower,
Where pearls and rubies fall in a shower
That would frighten Jupiter Ammon!
I need not tell
How it befell,
(Since Jenkins has told the story
Over and over and over again,
In a style I cannot hope to attain,
And covered himself with glory!)
How it befell one Summer's day,
The King of the Cubans strolled this way—

King January's his name, they say—
And fell in love with the Princess May,
The reigning belle of Manhattan,
Nor how he began to smirch and sue,
And dress as lovers who come to woo,
Or as Max Maretzek and Julien do,
When they sit full-blown in the ladies' view,
And flourish the wondrous baton.

He wasn't one of your Polish nobles,
Whose presence their country somehow troubles,
And so our cities receive them;
Nor one of your make-believe Spanish grandees,
Who ply our daughters with lies and candies,
Until the poor girls believe them.
No, he was no such charlatan—
Full of gasconade and bravado,
Count de Hoboken Flash-in-the-pan—
But a regular rich Don Estaban
Santa Cruz de la Muscovado
Senior Grandissimo Oviedo!

He owned the rental of half Havana
And all Matanzas; and Santa Anna,
Rich as he was, could hardly hold
A candle to light the mines of gold.
Our Cuban possessed, choke full of diggers,
And broad plantations, that, in round figures,
Were stocked with at least five thousand niggers!

"Gather ye rosebuds while ye may!"
The Senator swore to carry the day—
To capture the beautiful Princess May,
With his battery of treasures:
Velvet and lace should not lack;
Tiffany, Haughwout, Ball & Black,
Gerin and Stewart; his suit should back,
And com and go at her pleasure;
Jet and lava—silver and gold—
Garnets—emeralds rare to behold—
Diamonds—sapphires—wealth untold—
All were here, to have and to hold;
Enough to fill a peck-measure!

He did not bring all his forces on
At once, but like a crafty old Don,
Who many a heart had fought and won,
Kept bidding a little higher.

And every time he made his bid—
And what she said, and all they did—
"I was written down
For the good of the town,
By Jeebs, of The Daily Flyer."

A coach and horses, you'd think, would buy
For the Don, an easy victory;
But slowly our Princess yielded;
A diamond necklace caught her eye,
But a w. oath of pearls first made her sigh.
She knew the worth of each maiden glance,
And like young colts, that curvet and prance,
She led the Don a dance of a dance,
In spite of the wealth he wielded.
She stood such a fire of silks and lace,
Jewels, and golden dressing-cases,
And ruby brooches, and jets and pearls,
That every one of her dainty curls
Brought the price of a hundred common girls!

Folks thought the lass demented!
But at last a wonderful diamond ring,
A regular Koh-i-noor, did the thing,
And, sighing with love, or something the same,
The Princess May consented.

Ring! ring the bells, and bring!
All the people to see the thing!
Let the gaunt and hungry and ragged poor
Throng round the great Cathedral door,
To wonder what all the hubbub's for,
And sometimes stupidly wonder
At so much surshine and brightness Which
Fall from the church upon the rich
While the poor get all the thunder.

Ring! ring, merry bells, ring!
O fortunate few,
With letters blue—
Good for a seat and a nearer view!
Fortunate few, whom I dare not name:
Liletant! Creme de la creme!
We commoners stood by the street facade
And caught a glimpse of the cavalcade;
We saw the bride
In bediamonded pride,
With six jeweled maidens to guard her side—

Six lustrous maidens in tarlatans
She led the van of the caravan;
Close behind her, her mother, (Drest in gorgeous mater antique,
That told, as plainly as words could speak,
She was more antique than the other.)
Leaned on the arm of Don Estaban
Santa Cruz de la Muscovado
Senior Grandissimo Oviedo,
Happy mortal fortunate man!
And Maquis of El Dorado!

In they swept, all rich and graceful,
Silks and satins and Honiton lace;
In they swept from the dazzled sun,
And soon in the church the deed was done.

Three prelates stood on the chancel high—
A knot, that gold and silver can buy,
Gold and silver may yet untie;
Unless it is tightly fastened;
What's worth doing at all's worth doing
well,
And the sale of a young Manhattan
belle

Is not to be pushed or hastened,
So two Very-Reverends graced the scene,
And the tall Archbishop stood between,
By prayer and fasting chastened:
The Pope himself would have come from Rome,
But urgent matters kept him at home.
Haply these robes prelates thought Their words were the power that tied the knot;

But another power that love-knot tied,
And I saw the chain round the neck of the bride—
A glittering, priceless, marvelous chain,
Coiled with diamonds again and again,
As befits a diamond wedding;
Yet still 'twas a chain—I thought she knew it,
And halfway longed for the will to undo
it—
By the secret tears she was shedding.

But isn't it odd, to think, whenever
We all go through that terrible River,
Whose sluggish tide alone can sever
(The Archbishop says) the Church decree,
By floating one into Eternity,
And leaving the other alive as ever—
As each wades through that ghastly
stream,
The satins that rustle and gems that gleam
Will grow pale and heavy and sink away
To the noisome River's bottom clay;
Then the costly bride, and her maidens
six,
Will shiver upon the banks of the Styx,
Quite as helpless as they were born—
Naked souls, and very forlorn!

And the beautiful Empress, over yonder Whose crinoline made the wide world wonder—
And even ourselves and our dear little wives,
Who calico wear each morn of their lives—
And the sewing girls—and les chiffoniers
In rags and hunger the living day—
And all the hangers of the caravan—Aye, even the great Don Estaban
Santa Cruz de la Muscovado
Senior Grandissimo Oviedo—
That gold-encrusted, fortunate man!
All will land in naked equality!
The lord of a ribboned principality
Will mourn the loss of his cordons;
The Princess, too, must shift for herself,
And lay her royalty on the shelf;
Nothing to eat, and nothing to wear,
Will certainly be the fashion therof.

Ten to one, and I'll go it alone,
Those most used to a rag and bone—
Though here on earth they labor and groan—
Will stand it best when we come to rest,
On the other side of Jordan.

THE MARRIAGE OF THE SEASON.

(From the New York Times.)
The Nuptials of Don Estaban Santa Cruz de Oviedo and Miss Frances Amelia Bartlett.

REMARKS OF ARCHBISHOP HUGHES.
Mrs. Browning's fantastic vision in Aurora Leigh of the meeting of St. Giles and St. James at a wedding was in a manner realized yesterday morning, at the Roman Catholic Cathedral in Mott street in this city.

For most practical purposes, Mott street is just about as far from Fifth avenue and Fourteenth street as the coast of Africa, and the African element so completely preponderates in the street as to make the image singularly accurate. The artistic mind will therefore recognize at once the admirable fitness of such a locality for bringing out in the highest and most brilliant contrasts the fabulous splendors of a bridal ceremony, strictly Caucasian, not to say Circassian, in character, and conducted with a sumptuous disregard of conventional rules only to be paralleled in such creations of Oriental genius as the tale of Nouraddin and the Fair Persian, whom he bought for an incredible price and loved without any assignable limit.

The nuptials of Senior Don Estaban Santa Cruz de Oviedo with Miss Frances Amelia Bartlett, daughter of that distinguished ex-officer of the American Navy, Mr. J. Washington Bartlett, mark indeed an epoch in our social history. The premonitory symptoms of this memorable occurrence have enlivened for months past the dull current of cotemporary affairs. We need hardly recall to our readers the particulars of the many warm and vehement controversies which have been waged in the columns of divers leading journals, over the personal characteristics of the bridegroom, his age, the size of his whiskers, the amount of his fortune; over the trousseau of the bride, the number and quality of her robes, the exact value of her jewels, ranging from the enthusiastic magnificence of $600,000 to the disdainful and depreciatory triviality of a few beggarly diamonds and pearls.

In fact it may well be doubted whether the completion of a comprehensive system of matrimonial engagements which should unite all the bachelors of New York on one happy day to all the spinsters of New Jersey, would provoke more general or more ardent attention from the enlightened public and the enlightening press than has been excited by the widely disseminated rumors of the betrothal of Senior Estaban Santa Cruz de Oviedo millionaire in partibus, to Miss Frances Amelia Bartlett, belle at Washington, Saratogo and other lands and localities.

All things must culminate at last, and high noon of Thursday, the 13th of October, was eventually designated for the ripening of this notable matter; St. Patrick's Cathedral selected for the scene of the ceremony, and the Most Reverend the Roman Catholic Archbishop of New York nominated to the august duty of performing the solemn rites of the occasion. There remained, however, a grave problem to be solved. Popularity has its penalties as well as its pleasures, and the immense interest taken by several hundred thousand persons of both sexes in the welfare of Senior Oviedo and his fortunate bride made it necessary to devise some means of conciliating comfort with glory on the auspicious day.

The Cathedral in Mott street is hardly so large as St. Peter's at Rome. Mott street, itself, is less ample than Broadway, and as Fourteenth street with the Avenue, was of course to be summoned to the fete, something must be done to secure them a way of approach to the sacred edifice, and room within its walls where there—

The services of the police force were put in requisition, and the Superintendent-General, Mr. Pillsbury, consenting to usurp for a while the functions of the imperishable Brown, of Grace Church, combined a plan of operations, the excellence of which was abundantly vindicated by the triumphant result.

The Cathedral in Mott street has, of course a vestry, which vestry communicates most felicitously by a door way in the rear of the building with Mulberry street. The invited guests of the occasion were accordingly divided into two sections, to one of which tickets of a celestial blue, admitted the bearer from Mulberry street through the vestry, were distributed, while, to the other cards of a non-committal white were issued, passing them into the church by the Mott street doors. The significance given to the blue cards was, no doubt, meant as a graceful compliment to the nationality of the bridegroom—the blue blood of Spain, as is well known, marking the more aristocratic orders of the ancient Gothic monarchy. The pews in front of the Cathedral aisles, to the depth of some twenty or thirty feet, were partitioned off for the reception of the azure multitude, as it were in the manner of the orchestra stalls. The Condi-dati, or white card bearing guests, thronged behind this partition in such numbers, at a very early hour, as from time to time, seriously to menace, by their surging impetuosity, the stability of the frail barrier which alone stood between the nuptial solemnities and a scene of promiscuous social amalgamation from the thought of which every well regulated mind must recoil in horror.

Mott street and the region thereabouts swarmed at the top of the morning with excited crowds of partial-citizens of both sexes, and the ordinary occupations of the people were neglected, in their resolute determination to lose no glimpse of the elegant invaders, the report of whose advent had penetrated the remotest corner-shops, and disturbed the most placid cellars in that vicinity. The elegant invaders, and especially that portion of them which marched under the white flag, were not long in coming. For seats in the cathedral were only to be secured by pre-emption, and the principle of Squatter Sovereignty was the order of the day.

Before 11 o'clock the body of the Cathedral presented a scene of scrambling, shoving, clamor, crinolines, fans, fever, expectation, despair and hope, not to be surpassed in the Sibthorne Chapel where Allegri's Miserere never is, but is always "to be sung."

Long before that time, too, were the narrow roadways of this remarkable region blocked like the lanes leading to a battle-field, with horses, vehicles and angry officers. The clash of coal-carts with carriages, of beer-vans with broughams in these perilous defiles, was vast, universal and appalling. It is really highly creditable to the police that no serious accident should have occurred to blacken the brightness of the day; nor is it less creditable to the "good society" of New York, that we have heard of no arrests made for profane swearing, to which a perpetual series of temptation was offered.

As the hands on the dial neared the eventful stroke of twelve, a perceptible agitation pervaded the dense masses of the audience. Several aimable and corpulent priests ambled hurriedly in and out the little doors on either side of the altar, a mysterious bell or two twinkled in the distance, opera-glasses came into requisition in all parts of the house, and a few impassioned persons in the aisles got themselves severely snubbed by their intimate friends and other invited guests, for threatening small stampedes towards the front, which was kept with mas erly discipline by half a dozen good-looking "stars" posted on the steps of the chancel.

The "shameless noon" had hardly elapsed from all the steeples and ticked on a thousand watches in the pockets of the respectable company, when the Archbishop of New York, followed by his religious suite, entered the chancel to the pealing of the organ, and submitted himself to the ceremony of robing his portly form in the splendid habiliments appropriate to his rank. In the twinkling of an eye he flashed from violet into white and gold, his person rustling with heavily-embroidered satin, and on his head the towering golden archiepiscopal mitre nodding sublimely. He also wore a pair of gold spectacles, and supported, like Moses of old, on either hand by a goodly Aaron and Hur, one of whom bore his colossal gilded crozier, while the other carried a golden aspersoir, or sprinkling pot, of holy water, advanced to the chancel railing, there to meet the bridal party, which had entered immediately after him, and for profane eyes had somewhat extinguished the brief ceremonial within the chancel. The bridegroom led the way, his lady-mother-in-law elect leaning downward with dignity upon his elevated arm.

Senior Oviedo walked with a firm step and composed countenance, and his hair was most accurately arranged. His waistcoat, we believe, was made of white satin, and his cravat of point lace. His pantaloons and coat were sure were of a rich jet black in color, and probably made of Biola cloth. The lady-mother-in-law—but why detain our readers from the bride, who floated on behind, upon the arm of her father. This lovely cynosure of all eyes evidently did not fear the public gaze, nor needed to fear it. Her dazzling complexion was toned down by the delicate shadow of a splendid veil of Brussels point lace, caught up about her oval head by a wreath of orange blossoms almost bursting into flower. Flounces of Brussels point, two in number, "deep as first love," mystic and wonderful, adorned her white silk robe, born of the genius Genin. About her neck, itself a pearl, she wore four rows of shapely orient pearls, looped into a festoon by one slight rib of gleaming diamonds, gathered into the likeness of a knot of love. From this knot depended a single pear-shaped pearl, dipped in diamonds of surpassing lustre and beauty.

Disregarding the good old English song, which tells us that "The tip no jewell needs to wear,
The tip is jewell to the ear,"

this bride wore two pendant ear-rings formed of diamond solitaires of great splendor, supporting pear-shaped pearls of proportionate value, capped with brilliants. A brooch, one living Kohinoor mountain of light, reposed upon the quiet of a satisfied heart. This enviable ornament was all diamonds and pearls, the briolette diamond which forms its pendant being regarded by Messrs. Tiffany & Co., by whom the whole parure was imagined and created, as the most unimpeachable single stone in America for beauty and price. The workmanship of all these decorations is truly poetic. Assuming the diamonds to represent the manly constancy of the groom, and the pearls the modest loveliness of the bride, the cunning artificer has so contrived his work that, throughout all the parure, diamonds support pearls, and pearls confine diamonds, no obtrusive gleam of gold or silver appearing in the ornaments of the bride, as none of course appears in the union which binds her to another loving heart.

After these chief actors in the scene, a cloud of vague perfumes pervading all the azure space ushered in six beautiful maids, as many gallant men, the attendants of the happy pair. The beauteous maids, all translucent tarlatane and tender truth, floated to the left, the gallant men—chiefly Cubans, and occasionally more extravagant in their attentions to the audience than in their reverence of the altar—ranged themselves on the right; the bride and bridegroom went forward to the presence of the prelate—the father and mother took their places immediately behind the father manifesting so much emotion as compelled him to hide his face in a fine white handkerchief—the mother with a more Roman calmness, supporting her daughter in the trying ordeal by her own example; and the ceremony began. The spectators, and especially the great hive of white ants in the rear, now manifested so much eagerness to catch what was going on, as made the service almost as much a dumb-show to the great majority of those present as it must have been to the bridegroom, who is understood not to be a perfect master of the English tongue. Nevertheless, the service was duly performed, the rites were duly done; the holy water was duly sprinkled on the happy pair, and they twain were made one.

This being accomplished, the Archbishop took up his crozier and his parable together, settled his spectacles, and availing himself of the opportunity afforded by the numerous and variegated assembly before him, addressed the wedding party and the world for half an hour on the doctrine of discipline and divorce, and other appropriate subjects with his usual felicity and force. He spoke to the newly married pair of the new relation into which they had entered, and their consequences; of the distinction between marriage as authorized and approved by the Catholic Church; and marriage performed without religious sanction, and merely as a constitutional or human contract; of the origin of marriage as instituted by God and entered into by our first parents previous to the fall of the race. He said:

"This institution was the only one that had survived the fall of man, and all the calamities which man's iniquity had brought upon him. In reference to the importance of Christian marriage in its relations to society, he said the Church, while she certainly did not refuse to recognize a covenant between two persons who were free to enter into this covenant in the human or civil order as a binding contract, considered merely in a legal light, nevertheless held that covenant to be also a divine as well as a human contract. She held that God was the author of marriage; that He was the protector of its rights; that He was the avenger of its violations; in short that the Son of God on earth had raised this originally divine institution to the rank of a sacrament, which was much more awful and mighty than any mere civil contract could be. As a sacrament it had been appointed as a means to communicate grace, to the parties for a faithful and Christian discharge of the obligations which it involved. The Archbishop next spoke of the antagonism of the world and the Church with regard to the indissoluble character of Christian marriage. The Church had ever maintained that no power on earth could dissolve a Christian marriage once validly contracted. On this point she had resisted kings and emperors and principalities and powers from her very origin. She would maintain her creed on this head though it drove twenty Englands from her communion. The Archbishop said, Christian marriage furnished to the well-being of society an indispensable safeguard. It was the basis of all that was pure and honorable and decent, and dignified in the family and in society, which was composed of families. Hence society was wounded to the quick when sovereigns, or legislatures, or judges undertook the forbidden task of separating, in the very words of the Saviour, "what God hath joined together." Those who initiated this theory adverse to the words of Christ himself, did not foresee the consequences to which it would lead—

The privilege of divorce was an encouragement to discontent in the married life, and it had not been barren of results. Indeed, it had made such progress that in our day humanity itself was shocked at the wide range which was taken on this subject of matrimony. Degraded speculations were thrown out in newspapers, and it was said that even females who, raised from hereditary degradation only through the sanctity of holy marriage, now took part in discussions with regard to it, as if they, too, wished that matrimony should descend to a lower grade, so as to permit the parties making a contract to revoke their consent and dissolve the union at their option. To all this the Catholic Church was, and ever would be, opposed, no matter whether advocated by kings or by peoples, by Henry of England, or Napoleon of France. She, at least, would stand by the dignity resulting from the divine origin, and the elevation given to the marriage by God in the Garden of Eden, and by Christ in his life upon earth. The Archbishop next touched upon an idea that was scarcely worthy, he thought, of reflecting minds, that in certain cases, where the parties about to be married were of different creeds, there should be a double marriage, performed according to both rituals. This idea, he thought, was beneath the dignity of a Christian matrimony. It must strike any one who reflected for a moment as a flagrant absurdity, since, if the notion was correct, half a marriage might be performed on one side of the street, and if the other half was left unperformed on the other, the couple would be only half married. Marriage was a single act, and when completed, required and could receive no second performance. In conclusion, the Archbishop reminded the bridegroom of the magnitude of the trust that was now committed

THE VALLEY TAN.

STEPHEN DEWOLFE, Editor.

Wednesday, Dec. 14, 1859.

The Territorial Legislature, and the Governor's Message.

to him; of his rights and his duties in the married state. He warned the bride, too, of hers. To both he spoke of the trials of the married state, and advised them above all things to let religion be their Polar star. That they might be as happy as God ordinarily permitted married people to be, was the secret prayer of the many friend that surrounded them. It was his prayer, too, and it was the benediction which he invoked upon them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost.

Thus warned against any imitation of King Henry VIII. or Napoleon I., and encouraged with the reasonable hope of an average conjugal happiness, the bridegroom was then dismissed, the bride turning to the audience, gladdened a thousand eyes with the spectacle of her untruffled beauty as she embraced one after another her parents and her bridesmaids; shook hands with her groomsmen, and retiring through the vestry, took carriage for her paternal home in Fourteenth street. The crowd, blue, white, black and gray, dispersed itself as best it could. Most sett saw the vision of love and luxury fade from its battered and seedy precincts as suddenly as it had arisen; the distinguished wonder-seekers departed, and the interest of the day, dying gently out through three hours of Brown, policemen, bride-cake, homage, oysters, jam, suffocation, admiration and the wretchedness of trousseaux at the house of Mr. Bartlett in Fourteenth street, passed into history forever and these faithful chronicles. The wedding reception was a "reception" and nothing more. We have described it in a single sentence above; enough that it ended as all receptions will, though no one actually "receiving" or "received" can persuade himself of the fact while they are in progress; and that the "happy pair" proceeded to Boston in the Sound steamer at the usual hour. The wedding itself, as we think our readers will admit, was a wedding and "something more." Doubtless we shall never see its like again among us till from the vast void another Senor Oveido shall arise to wed another Miss Bartlett—to give the press another saturnalia of instructive personal gossip; the jeweler and the milliner another Arcadian age of bridal orders; and Archbishop Hughes another occasion for an impressive discourse urbis et orbis, to the town and the world, on the causes of the English Reformation, and the secret of making home as "happy as can be usually expected."

Delila Bacon.

"The Worcester Spy reports that Miss Delila Bacon, whose name is for several years been familiar to the public, in connection with her theory as to the authorship of Shakspeare's plays, died a short time since in the Insane Retreat at Hartford, where she has been an inmate since her return from England, last Spring."

Connected with this unfortunate lady is a most curious and melancholy history. She is mentioned as having died very recently. The fact is that her death took place months ago. Her relatives, one of whom, a brother, is a Presbyterian clergyman of great eminence in New Haven or Hartford—have been sensitive on the subject of her insanity and confinement in consequence of it. Both, together with the sad conclusion of that confinement have, attempted to be kept from the knowledge of the world. But there was really nothing required to be concealed. Hers was the case of a gifted woman who was crushed by the pressure on an "over-wrought brain."—St. Louis Herald.

THE GREAT PROBLEM OF THE SOURCE OF THE NILE, which has occupied the attention of the world during so many ages, may now be considered definitively solved, Capt. Speke, who has just returned to England from an extended tour in Central Africa, in company with Capt. Burton, discovered a lake, called by the natives Nyanza, but by the Arabs Ukerewe, which appears to be the great reservoir of the Nile. It extends from 2 deg. 30 min. south to 3 deg. 30 min. north latitude, lying across the equator in east longitude 33 deg. Its waters are the drainage of numerous hills which surround it on almost every side. The new lake washes out the Mountains of the Moon as at present existing in our atlases.

A belle at a down-east husking roll on being asked by a young farmer if he might kiss her, answered, "Not till you have complied with the rules, and passed the ruby-corn."

The members elect of the ninth annual session of the Utah Legislature, in accordance with a former adjournment and the proclamation of Gov. Cumming, convened at the Social Hall in this city on Monday last, and organized by electing D. H. Wells President pro-tem of the council, and John Taylor Speaker pro-tem of the House. After which a joint committee from the two houses was appointed to examine the credentials of the members. These being found correct by the report of the committee, the organization of the two Houses was rendered complete by confirming the elections of Messrs Wells, and Taylor to the positions to which they were temporarily chosen, and by the election of the other officers of the two Houses. After this, a joint committee was appointed to wait on Gov. Cumming and inform him of the organization of the Legislature, and their readiness to receive any communication that he might have to lay before them. This committee soon returned, and the message of the Governor was soon after received and read in the joint session of the two Houses. This message which we publish entire, is a plain, practical document, free alike from prolixity of style, and irrelevancy in matter, it is such a message in short, as might be expected from a man of Gov. Cumming's practical and conservative turn of mind, and one that will commend itself, no doubt, as well to the ladies to whom it is immediately addressed, as to the masses represented by them. Its recommendations are such, as, if followed, will promote the welfare and advance the interests of all dwellers in this Territory; those, in regard to making provision by law for the establishment of public schools in the Territory, and recommending that the Church tithing be taxed like other property, and the proceeds set apart for this purpose, and also, that the appropriations heretofore made for military purposes, be henceforth discontinued, and that an equal amount instead thereof be applied in future to educational purposes, appeared to us, peculiarly just and appropriate.

But while we fully concur in these and most of the other recommendations of the message, if we were to exercise our talent at criticism, and assume as most editors do, the right of judging concerning the merits of a public document like this, whether qualified to do so, or not, we should say that in some respects the message of Gov. Cumming was faulty from omission.

Thus, while speaking of the jurisdiction of the courts of the Territory, and the decision of the federal judges here, that the act of the Territorial Legislature which conferred upon the Probate Courts common law and chancery jurisdiction was void, because in conflict with the proper construction of the organic act, while Gov. Cumming recommends that the "question be taken up through the proper tribunals for a final decision," he neglects to add that the question is so taken up and decided, the decision of the federal judges is binding on the Probate Courts by the laws of the Territory; section first, of the "act in relation to the judiciary," on page 120 of the Territorial Statutes, conferring upon the District Courts "a general supervision over all inferior courts, to prevent and correct abuses where no other remedy is provided."

Gov. Cumming is no doubt aware that the Probate Court of this county has not only assumed the exercise of criminal jurisdiction, since it was decided in the District Court, in the case of the "People vs. Gibson," that it did not possess such jurisdiction; but also that the Probate Court, in defiance of a writ of prohibition from the District Court, commanding a stay of proceedings in the case of Clawson versus Hartnett, nevertheless went on, and rendered judgment in the case and issued execution thereon. These acts amounted to usurpation and a total subversion of law on the part of the Probate Court, and it seems to us, that the Governor, while referring to the subject, should, at least, have condemned the unwarranted action of the court in the case referred to, and have counselled obedience to law in those who assume to administer it.

But there is another omission in Gov. Cumming's message, which is more to be regretted than the one referred to. He does not once refer to the degrading and disgusting crime of polygamy, which is so extensively practised in this Territory, or recommend any laws for its suppression and punishment. It may be that Gov. Cumming kept silence on this subject from motives of consideration and respect for the members of the legislature, knowing that most or all of them were guilty of the sin. But no motive of mere prudence or politeness, it seems to us, should have led the Governor to pass over in silence, a practice which is not only a violation of the common law of the land, but which is reprobated and condemned by every civilized nation on earth. The extent to which the practice here does not change at all its character any more than the authority by which it is sought to be upheld. It is as criminal and degrading in a member of the Utah legislature, as it is in the wretch who elsewhere is punished for the offence by incarceration within a penitentiary; and if the act of one merits punishment, that of the other certainly merits the recommendation of laws for the purpose. We are sorry, therefore, that Gov. Cumming, in his message, did not adopt the course pursued by Judge Sinclair last year, when he was officially consulted about the laws of the Territory, and requested to suggest such amendments and alterations as, in his opinion, would be beneficial. To this request the Judge replied by recommending the passage of an act for the prevention and punishment of polygamy.

THAT BALL.

"Come hither, come hither—by night and by day,
We linger in pleasures that never are gone;
Like the waves of the summer, as air dies away,
Another as smart and as shining comes on."

As the love that is over, in expiring gives birth
To a new one as warm, as unequalled in bliss;
And oh! if there be an Elysium on earth,
It is this—it is this."

Tom Moore.

The Ball at the Townsend House last Friday evening was, perhaps, one of the most elegant and rehabilitated affair that ever came off in Utah Territory. It was conducted under the immediate superintendence and management of our most genial and worthy marshal, Peter K. Dotson, Esq., and we have heard praises without number bestowed on Mr. Dotson for the excellence of his arrangements, and the felicitous manner he has of promoting the happiness of those who come within the range of his fine genius and tact.

We have never heard that Mr. Dotson was a professed teacher in the noble art of dancing, but from the perfectly au fait manner with which he arranged and appointed things last Friday evening, we are led to believe that in former days, before he became marshal of our happy Territory, that he must have been a professor in the art, which he still knows how to conduct with the judgment and taste of a finished connoisseur. There are few, if any amusements, in our way of thinking, that are at once so pleasant while passing, so agreeable in memory, and so useful in tendency, as dancing. It brings together the young of both sexes, who otherwise might have no opportunity of becoming acquainted; it knocks off the rough edges from the manners of young men, and draws out all the bewitching sweetness and the bright smiles of lovely women, besides drawing within its magic circle, many persons of opposite beliefs, and jealous natures who otherwise might never meet except in heated and angry discussions, or in the dull rotting of trade. Here no jealousies of creed obtrude themselves; no cares of business fret or engage; no animosities of any kind rise to mar the general desire to confer, and receive happiness, which animates the breasts of all; and persons practise unconsciously, the sum of both moral and christian obligations, so far as their fellow beings are concerned, while engaged in a simple recreation; for all aim at promoting the happiness of others; and talk as we may, and differ as we may on other matters, to increase the sum of human happiness is the great duty we owe to one another in this world.

Now we acknowledge that we are fond of pleasure and enjoyment—and have a weakness for bright eyes, sweet smiles, beautiful dresses, delicate hands, tiny feet in white slippers, rose buds, together with a thousand other charms and allurements with which some people in the world tyrannize over others. We confess that we are even so common-place and unpoetical as to relish a good supper at times, and we feel to bear testimony to the excellence of the one prepared by Mr. Townsend, for the members of the party the other evening, and to the fact of our doing full and ample justice to it. But how shall we speak of the ladies in attendance upon the ball? It would be invidious to particularize any of them, when all were so lovely and attractive.

Well, we have in, and acknowledge that the task is beyond us. Our hearts suggest a great deal, but pen and language are inadequate to reveal its secrets, and we will let "Concealment like a worm in the bud," Hide its throbbings, whether it prays or "damask cheek" or not. And the gentlemen present, how shall we speak of them? They were all gallant knights of course, and all performed their parts with scrupulous regard to the entertainment and happiness of the fair, as becomes true and faithful knights. Here again it is perhaps unjust to discriminate when all did so well; but we know that we but give expression to a sentiment felt by all ladies as well as all gentlemen, when we say, that among the gentlemen present there was one, who, from the graceful suavity of his manner, the peculiar grace and dignity of his bow, the felicitous wave of his hand, and the persuasive manner in which he dropped on his knees at times, at the foot of some lady while soliciting her hand in the dance—these, with many other peculiar and graceful motions, will readily be attributed to the proper person, and made him without doubt, as much admired by the ladies, as he was envied by the gentlemen.

But the ball had an end, and no more our article; but another ball is to be held next Thursday evening, at the same place, and under the same superintendence as the last, and if any body has consideration enough to send a cash subscription for our paper, we expect to go, and in this happy anticipation we close.

The Eastern mail arrived last night just before dark. By the kindness of Mr. Morrell we were favored with a few papers last evening in advance of the general delivery of the mail. In looking over these papers, we discovered nothing of unusual or particular interest.

The party that came in with the mail, state that the persons who went out with the last mail got lost in a violent snow storm near the Bear River Station, and wandered about all night, all of them were somewhat frozen about their hands or feet, but none of them very badly. Mr. Bromley, the agent, had one of his hands frozen on the back, but was able to go on with the mail.

Mr. Editor:—The Deseret News of December 7th contains some lengthy remarks upon the condition of the hall, and the preparations made for the comfort of the members of the present legislature, which met on the 12th, pursuant to a call of the Governor. It goes on to tell how badly the members are treated in not being provided with extra pen-knives, ink-stands, paper, &c., and a person not acquainted with such matters would think that it was some old and valuable member of Congress, instead of the organ of a pack of ignorant men who are not elected by the people, but receive their certificates of office from that power whose will is not to be questioned, in all such matters, when the good of his people is concerned. The editor states that he has seen more comfort in an Indian wigwam—he should have stated that he has seen more political talent and honesty in the same place. We know nothing about the stolen property, but think the Secretary has a right to know what becomes of all missing government property if he can, and would recommend him to place some responsible person at the door, and as those members who will be "seen wending their way with a chair upon their shoulders, ink-stand and paper in their hands," perhaps some of the lost property may be recovered. We also recommend that impetuous youth whose discretion out-ran his valor, to remember that the Secretary will probably return this winter, and that it is never too late to vindicate a reputation that has once been impeached (provided the fact be not proven); in that case, we recommend silence upon the subject; and above all things to remember that threats, like chickens, are apt to come home to roost—also that the person of the Secretary is considered quite sound by his good old Uncle Sam, and would, no doubt, be quite angry if he should be injured while in the discharge of his duties as overseer of these salt-works.

These remarks, if read at all in the States, would only add to the good reputation that gentleman has already earned as a faithful and careful disbursing officer—and in his absence, we make no doubt, his Excellency Governor Cumming, will do all that his wisdom and long experience dictates. In regard to the pickings and stealings, which he states are not to be had any more, it may be there is nothing left to steal, for in reading the acts of past sessions, we discover that all the kanyons are pre-occupied, the bridges and ferries all chartered, the water courses all taken up, mill privileges all appointed, and the taxes upon merchandise so heavy, that a man, to do business, must devote all his time, money and credit to that purpose. If there is a deficiency in the furniture for the hall, look for some of it in the Council-house; for a stove, look in the big field; for a Jefferson's Manual to organize the house, apply to the Sons of Temperance, at Camp Floyd, or to Horace Greeley, who, as secretary of the Free Love Society, would be glad to furnish the by-laws of that illustrious fraternity; for pencils use my toe-nails, for paper use the fly-leaves of the public documents that have been franked out here by the last delegate, and when that runs out, buy some erasive powder and wash out some 200 tons of Patent Office Reports, that are laying about in any public office throughout the Territory.

Mr. Editor:—Having seen in some paper that the population of Utah amounts to 83,000 souls, I have concluded to furnish you with a calculation as to the probable number that will be in the Valley in 1864, should the emigration fund hold out, and there be a gathering of the Saints at that time. I propose to divide them as follows:

Men	16,000
Women	32,000
From 14 to 20 years old	74,000
Children of both sexes	48,000
Total	83,000
Increase first year	87,000
2d "	74,000
3d "	148,000
4th "	269,000
Add to this 200,000 more in Europe with an increase of 300 per cent.	800,000
Total	1,239,000

Add to this the result of the labor of 17,000 missionaries, now abroad, who are expected to send a ship-load each year, each ship to contain 600 souls, and we find the sum little number 16,200,000,001,239,000 and one-half, which proves that "large trees from little acorns grow." Let the people all be diligent, and contribute as much as possible to the perpetual emigration fund.

ARITHMETIC.

THE MOST CURIOUS BOOK IN THE WORLD.—One that was produced in France about three years ago. It is entitled, "Liber Passionis Domini Jesu Christi, and in neither written nor printed." The letters are cut out of the finest vellum, and being interleaved with blue paper, may be read as easily as the best of print. The materials are of the most delicate and costly kind; the workmanship exquisitely exact, and the labor necessary to complete the work must have been immense. In 1640, Rudolphus II, of Germany, offered for it 11,000 livres, nearly equal to 60,000 dollars for dollars at this day.

A FUNNY BLUNDER IN THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY.—To people who are in the habit of criticising severely such errors as appear in the daily press, caused by the haste with which the matter must be prepared, set up and corrected, says the St. Louis Democrat, we commend the following extract from the Atlantic Monthly for October: a periodical supposed to be got up with particular care and correctness in all respects. In a story called "the Wondersmith," page 463, we read:

"The bit of orange peel lying on the side walk inspires thought. Who will fall over it? Who but the industrious mother of six children, the eldest of which is only nine months old, all of whom are dependent on her exertions for support."

A STRANGE MEETING AND A STRANGE PARTING.—Not long ago a steamboat coming up the river ran aground at Burlington. Among the passengers were a lady from Covington and a stranger who took passage at Cincinnati—a man about thirty years of age, with no baggage but a good suit of clothes, which he carried upon his well-shaped person. The two individuals indicated became very intimate during the trip and the first night after the boat ran aground they were talking in the cabin, when, to the amazement of all the passengers, they rushed into each other's arms, and the lady called the man her long lost husband, and the man called the lady his lost wife, and they made a right pathetic thing of it. The lady told the captain that her husband had left her seven years before, and the husband accounted for his absence by saying that he had been unjustly imprisoned "down in Arkansas" for a crime that he never committed. The story was believed, and the parties had the warm sympathies of the passengers.

When the boat arrived at Marietta the man went ashore under the pretence of getting something for his wife, but did not return, although he was sent for repeatedly, and could not be found. The wife wept many tears of sorrow, and carried on so violently that the captain had to put her off about three miles above Marietta, when she started back to hunt for the defaulter.—Wheeling Intell.

Mrs. Lucy Stone denies that Judge Douglas wrote the letter to her which has had an extensive circulation. Writing to the Boston Liberator, she says: "I am surprised to learn that the letter going the rounds of the papers, purporting to be from Stephen Arnold Douglas to me, is being received as a veritable correspondence. The hoax seemed to me so barefaced that I never gave it a second thought. I have never written to or received a line from Mr. Douglas."

Too us. Two.—We may admire the ingenuity, though certainly not the honesty, of the punning executor, who, having three bank notes of a hundred pounds each to divide among five legatees, of whom he himself was one, said: "Here is one for you two, one for you two and one for me too."

Gerri Smith is crazy. He has been sent to the Lunatic Asylum at Utica, N. York.

Governor's Message to the Legislative Assembly.

12th December, 1859.
To the Council and House of Representatives of the Legislature of Utah.
GENTLEMEN:—The Legislative Assembly of eighteen hundred and fifty-eight and nine, adjourned in this city on the twenty-first day of January last, to re-assemble on the second Monday in December of the present year, at the Social Hall in this city, at which place we are now convened for the purpose of discharging duties which devolve upon us under the authority of the Organic Act, for this Territory.

During the past year the inhabitants of this Territory, for the most part, have been peacefully and profitably employed in their various occupations. But I regret to be obliged to state that this city and the village of Fairfield, near Camp Floyd, in the military Reserve, have been the scenes of many murders and other acts of violence, the perpetrators of which have fled, and thus eluded justice.

All communities are dishonored in proportion to the extent in which crimes are committed with impunity in their midst. If the organization of the police be defective, it should be reformed; and if there be a deficiency in the finances of these cities, for enabling them to arrest offenders, I would recommend that an appropriation be made for their relief from the territorial treasury.

An act to establish a territorial government for Utah, approved fifth September, eighteen hundred and fifty, contains the following language:

"The judicial power of said Territory shall be vested in a Supreme Court, District Courts, Probate Courts, and in Justices of the Peace."
"The jurisdiction of said several courts herein provided for, both appellate and original, and that of Probate Courts and Justices of the Peace, shall be as limited by law." The Legislative Assembly of Utah for the year eighteen hundred fifty-two, passed an "act in relation to the judiciary," approved fourth of February, eighteen hundred fifty-two. Section twenty-ninth of that act reads thus:—"The several Probate Courts in their respective counties have power to exercise original jurisdiction, both civil and criminal, and as well in Chancery, as at common law; when not prohibited by legislative enactment."

This act also provides for appeals from Probate Courts. Thus, it will be perceived that your predecessors, seven years ago, under the construction of the power granted by the Organic Act, conferred upon the Probate Courts both civil and criminal jurisdiction, in addition to the powers ordinarily granted to Probate Courts. I have been informally advised that the Federal Judges have virtually disapproved of this construction of the Organic Act, as indicated in this action of the Legislative Assembly, yet I am not aware that any case has come before these officers in such form as to elicit a decision upon its merits, so as to establish a legal principle. I would therefore recommend that this question be taken up through the proper tribunals for a final decision. If the action of the Legislature be sustained, this community will enjoy the undisputed right of protection through the prompt action of a tribunal always present, instead of being obliged to await the tardy action of the District Courts, which are in session but once a year. If, however, the decision of the Supreme Court should be adverse to the exercise of such power by the Probate Court, you will then be relegated from the embarrassment growing out of its disputed powers.

Col. S. C. Stambaugh, Surveyor General for the Territory of Utah, commenced on the 26th day of October, 1859, an examination of certain surveys made during the administration of his predecessor, the accuracy of which surveys has been questioned. If these surveys be approved, it may be reasonably supposed, that the Government will establish Land offices here, so soon as the Indian title shall have been extinguished.

In view of the public lands in this Territory, being offered for sale, by the proclamation of the President of the United States, I would commend to your consideration the propriety of adopting some legislation in relation to the grants of kanyons, water power, timber, tillable lands, and other property belonging to the United States. I am aware that these grants are considered as only temporary arrangements, for the purpose of inducing parties to spend labor and money in rendering the property available. It is quite evident, however, that all these grants will entirely valueless unless sanctioned by the United States Government, which is vested the exclusive ownership of these lands, and from which alone any valid title can be derived. Under existing circumstances, the lands of the Territory, to be used for herds of cattle, and other purposes, are unreasonably large, and their occupancy has become exceedingly oppressive to certain portions of the community. I would recommend the adoption of measures for their eventual abolition. The land laws of our country are based upon wise and liberal principles, and extend their protection to actual settlers upon the public domain, against the usurpation of the lands and speculations of monopolists. When the lands are open to sale, and pre-emption, the public interest, and more especially the interest of the poorer classes, would be promoted by restricting claims by law to less quarter sections, and I believe they should be restricted to lots, not exceeding twenty acres each. I would recommend that Congress be memorialized on the subject of subdivision of quarter sections, in accordance with the suggestions contained in the foregoing paragraph, and also for the permanent establishment of some system for the equitable distribution of water and timber. If this latter provision be neglected, the new occupants of the canyons and timbered lands may exercise an oppressive influence upon the occupants of the valuable lands in the valleys.

In my communication to the Legislative Assembly on the 15th day of December, eighteen hundred and fifty-eight, I endeavored to impress upon that body the vital importance of appropriating a portion of the territorial revenue to the establishment and maintenance of common schools throughout the Territory, and I again urge that subject upon your earnest consideration.

The rising generation are about to become the proprietors of the soil, and the fathers in the important affairs of life. The children of the poor are equally entitled to the benefits of education with those of the rich. Therefore let a system of taxation be adopted, which will enable all to receive that instruction from which some are at present comparatively debarred. Competent instructors cannot be expected to devote their time to teaching, unless liberal and certain compensation be received by them.

I am informed, that, in this Territory, a large fund is annually derived from the titling of the people. This fund, I esteem as a legitimate object for taxation, as well as the other church property. I therefore suggest the passage of a law, for securing a revenue for educational and other purposes, from these sources.

By reference to the Auditor's Report, you will perceive there is

Appropriated to military purposes	2,205 00
Adj't Gen'l's salary	1,000 00
Premium on Gunpowder	200 00
Making an aggregate of	$3,405 00

If this sum, mentioned as appropriated to military and the like purposes, were expended for the advancement of education in this Territory, would not the community be benefited by the exchange?

The establishment of annual Fairs for the encouragement of agricultural and mechanical industry, is entitled to the protection and aid of the Legislature.

I herewith submit the Report of the Treasurer and Auditor, embodied in which is the report of the Warden of the Penitentiary.

The Treasurer's report shows a balance in the Treasury of $4339 42.

The Auditor's Report shows an estimated balance of $1157 88.

These reports you will refer to the proper committees.

The report of the affairs of the Penitentiary by the Warden, exhibits the number of prisoners, and contains an estimate of the appropriation necessary for their subsistence. The Penitentiary system, as applied in this Territory, seems to be peculiarly unfitted for carrying out the intention of its projectors. There will probably be only a small number of convicts confined at any one time, and I am acquainted with no kind of labor which, in this country, would defray the expense of the maintenance of the prisoners, and the payment of a suitable guard. The continuance of the system under these circumstances subjects the Territory to a heavy expense, without furnishing corresponding advantage. The building itself is objectionable, in consequence of the original defects in the plan of its structure, and, from its present dilapidated state, caused by a violent storm in the year eighteen hundred and fifty-eight. It originally consisted of two stories; the upper, constructed of adobe, divided into two rooms; the lower, built of sandstone, divided into small cells. The eastern gable end of the building, and a large portion of the roof, were destroyed by the storm above alluded to. As there are no work-shops, tools or materials provided for work, the prisoners must necessarily be confined to their cells for want of proper occupation, or be permitted to rove about within the adobe walls, which surround the building, passing an indolent and unproductive existence.

I have been informed that the Secretary reported the dilapidated condition of the building to the Department at Washington, but I have no knowledge of the character of the reply, if any reply were received. I would suggest such modifications of the penal code as would lawfully subject prisoners, convicted of penitentiary offences, to service in constructing new and repairing the old roads of the Territory. The organized bands of thieves for the stealing of horses and other animals, have become so numerous and audacious, that I deem it indispensably necessary that the most stringent measures should be taken without delay, to ensure their punishment.

I recommend the passage of a law making it obligatory upon the City Councils of Great Salt Lake, Provo, and other cities, to publish, at their own expense, a digest of their ordinances, in a convenient form, within thirty days after the promulgation of such acts. Also, that all new ordinances, hereafter enacted, shall be published in one or more papers of G. S. L. City within ten days after their enactment. Also, that they should publish quarterly itemized financial reports of the amount of receipts and expenditures, showing the sources whence the receipts have been derived, and for what purposes they have been expended. Also, that they should cause to be thoroughly cleaned, and kept open the principal water-ditches in their respective cities, and establish convenient crossings at the intersection of streets.

Also, the expense of keeping in repair the road between the north boundary of this city and the gate near the city bath-house, should be equally divided between Davis County and this city. The supervisor of said road to be appointed by the County Court of Davis County. Also, the expense of keeping in repair the State Road from the southern wall of the city to the bridge on Little Cottonwood should be equally defrayed by Great Salt Lake City and County. Also, that the citizens of this place should be exempt from all other road tax, except those indicated in the above recommendations.

I especially call your attention to the dilapidated condition of the bridge over the Jordan at the foot of North Temple Street.

In the month of June, 1859, the officer, in command of the Department of Utah, detached, under the command of an experienced officer, what he deemed a suitable military force for the protection of emigration on the northern California Route. Notwithstanding this precaution, many persons passing from the Eastern States to California by that route, were murdered by Indians supposed to belong to the roving bands of Banacks and Sho-sho-nees. These Indians are reported to have stolen and destroyed the property of the emigrants. It is probable that the officer in command of the Department will establish posts upon this line, which will secure hereafter the emigration on this route from similar disasters.

With the exception of the depredations above alluded to, and some robberies on the new mail route, west of Camp Floyd, the Indians have been, for the most part, peaceable.

Under the authority of the Secretary of War, a party, commanded by Lieut. Humphreys, U. S. A., began an exploration of the country between the Cheyenne River (a tributary of the Missouri) and the head waters of the Yellowstone River. This exploration, when accomplished, I am induced to believe, from my knowledge of the country, will demonstrate the fact that Great Salt Lake City is within three hundred and fifty, or four hundred miles of steamboat navigation on the tributaries of the Missouri.

A communication, recently received by me from an officer of the Army, in charge of a reconnaissance between Fort Vancouver and this point, induces the belief that the distance from this City to steamboat navigation on Snake River (a tributary of the Columbia) will not exceed four hundred miles, thus placing this people in intimate connection with the Pacific Coast on the West, and the Atlantic on the East.

The present state of public opinion indicates this region as a portion of the route most suitable for the establishment of Railroad communication between the Oceans.

It is not unreasonable to anticipate an union of the interests of the South-ern overland mail with those of the mail which present runs from St. Joseph's through this city to San Francisco.

If this union should be accomplished and this route adopted, in my opinion, a great public interest would be advanced, and a weekly mail secured, the transit of which, between New York and San Francisco through this city, would not exceed eighteen or twenty days.

May the blessing of the Almighty Ruler of the universe rest upon your labors, and your action during this session be profitable to the Territory.

A. CURRIER.

THE GROWING POPULARITY OF SENATOR DOUGLAS.—The Boston Herald, one of the ablest and most widely circulated Democratic papers in New England, in speaking of the prospects of the different Presidential candidates for nomination at the Charleston Convention, thus comments upon the conduct of those who are building their hopes of preferment upon sectional agitation. "The Herald is right in its opinion that the success of the Democratic party in the next Presidential canvass depends upon the nomination of Senator Douglas. The fact is daily becoming more and more apparent all over the Union, that he is the only man upon whom an enthusiastic and united rally of the Democracy can be made, north and south, east and west, and we look upon his nomination as a fixed fact. But hear the Boston Herald: "Presidential aspirants are the cause, in a great measure, of the divisions which are now distracting the party. Let them cease their insatiable ambition; cease from giving up to sectionalists and secessionists the power which cannot be taken from the party they profess to belong to, if they bend their efforts to make it so. Many weary nights have I passed in the endeavor to reconcile myself to leaving you whom I loved so well, and this bright world of sunshine and beauty; and hard indeed it is to struggle on silently and alone, with the sure conviction that I am about to leave all forever, and go down into the dark valley." "But I know in whom I have believed," and leaning on His arm, "I fear no evil. Do not blame me for keeping even all this from you. How could I subject you of all others, to such sorrow as I feel at parting, when time will soon make it apparent to you! I could have wished to live, if only to be at your side when your time shall come, and pillow your head on my breast, wipe the death damps from your brow, and usher your departing spirit into its maker's presence, embalmed in woman's holiest prayer. But it is not to be, and I submit: Yours is the privilege of watching through long and dreary nights, for Mr. Douglas is not exaggerated, the spirit's final flight, and transferring his sinking head from your breast to my Savior's bosom! And in every Free State than can be given, you shall share my last thoughts, and on to any other Democrat. There are hosts of men in every country in the North, who, although they have been heretofore opposed to the Democratic party, declare their determination to vote for Senator Douglas, if he is the nominee. They admire his man, and they like his principles. If the Charleston convention desires to elect its candidate, certainly it will choose Mr. Douglas. We must have our strongest man on the course. It is utterly folly to nominate a man to be defeated.

A writer in the Boston Journal says that Mr. Bonner cannot drive his famous team consisting of Lantern and Lady Woodruff. When put on their speed, says the writer, he cannot manage them, and when he appears on the "road" with his $14,000 team, he is obliged to employ a professional driver to attend him. This is nonsense. There is not in New York a more docile span of horses, whether going fast or slow; and any clever boy of twelve could drive them at the top of their speed without difficulty or danger.

A person pretending to have seen a ghost was asked what the apparition said to him. "How should I know," he replied, "I am not skilled in the dead languages."

The following ideas were conceived by the reception of a letter from a very dear friend, with the impress in sealing wax: "DO COME."

"Do come," methinks I hear the sound, From one whose heart a sincere, profound, "Do come," the echo's in my ears, "Do come," and quell my doubts and fears.

"Do come," and cheer my weary heart, "Do come," why should we dwell apart, "Do come," we may be happy yet, "Do come," your promises don't forget, "Do come," I've watched and waited long.

"Do come," do come my constant song, "Do come," the fatted calf I'll kill, "Do come," my truth, I'll then fulfill, "Do come," let no exception stay, I long to know thou'rt on the way, At morn and eve, I'll pray, God bless, Thy journey through the wilderness: And when life's journey's o'er and past, May we meet in heaven at last, To reign with Christ, Emanuel, say, "Till then, God bless thee fare-thee well, DRAGON!"

Letter of a Dying Wife.

The following letter from a dying wife to her husband, says the Nashville Gazette, was found by him some months after her death, between the leaves of a religious volume which she was very fond of perusing. The letter which was literally dim with her tear-marks, was written long before her husband was aware that the grasp of disease had fastened upon the lovely form of his wife, who died at the early age of nineteen.

"When this shall reach your eyes, dear George, some day when you are turning over the relics of the past, I shall have passed away forever, and the cold white stone will be keeping its lonely watch over the lips you have so often pressed, and the sod will be growing green that shall hide forever from your sight the dust of one who has often nestled close to your warm heart. For many long and sleepless nights, when all besides my thoughts were at rest, I have wrestled with the consciousness of approaching death, until at last it has forced itself upon my mind; and although to you and to others it might now seem but the nervous imagination of a girl, yet, dear George, it is so! Many weary nights have I passed in the endeavor to reconcile myself to leaving you whom I loved so well, and this bright world of sunshine and beauty; and hard indeed it is to struggle on silently and alone, with the sure conviction that I am about to leave all forever, and go down into the dark valley." "But I know in whom I have believed," and leaning on His arm, "I fear no evil. Do not blame me for keeping even all this from you. This is nonsense. There is not in New York a more docile span of horses, whether going fast or slow; and any clever boy of twelve could drive them at the top of their speed without difficulty or danger.

WENDELL PHILLIPS ON THE INSURRECTION.—New York, Nov. 2.—Wendell Phillips, of Boston, delivered a lecture last night in Brooklyn, in which he argued that John Brown was the only American who had acted boldly up to the true American idea, and cast aside all these false and fatal wrappings of an egotism conservatism, and refused to regard any such thing as government or any statute as law, except those which conformed to his own sense of justice and of right. Virginia was not a State; Gov. Wise was not a Governor; the Union was not a nation—all these so-called governments were organized piracies, and John Brown was to-day, the only real and true Government on the soil of Virginia, and had an infinite better right to hang Governor Wise than Governor Wise had to hang him. He also said, "I think you can make a better use of iron than forging it into Sharp's rifles. It is a great deal better used that way than in fetters; a great deal better than a great clumsy statue of a false great man, for men to kneel down and worship in a State House Yard."

Thomas Corwin of Ohio, was present on the platform, and being called upon for a speech, said he was there merely by accident, and begged to be allowed to reflect upon what he had heard, before giving his vote upon the matter.

JOHN PHENIX, IN THE LADIES' CAR.—John Phoenix, the inimitable wit, thus tells an incident connected with a ride on the New York Central Railroad. He relates it in a letter Knickerbocker, Mayazine and puts it on record to serve as a caution to future innocent travelers. He says: "I had observed at each change of the cars, and they were frequent, when the general scramble took place, one car was defended from the assault by a stalwart man, usually of stalwart persuasion, who, deaf to menaces, unsifted by bribes, maintained his post for the benefit of the 'ladies'.

"Ladies' car, sir, as you please; forded car for gentlemen without ladies."

"Need I say this car was the most comfortable of the train, and with that stern resolve which ever distinguished me in the discharge of my duty toward myself, I determined to get into it. So when we changed cars at Utica, I rushed forth and seeing a nice young person with a pretty face, bonnet and shawl, and a large portmanteau, urging her way through the crowd, I stepped up by her side, and with my native grace and gallantry, offered my arm and assistance. They were gratefully accepted, and proud of my success, I urged my fair charge up to the platform of the ladies' car, My old enemy was holding the door."

"Is this your lady, sir?"

"With an inward apology to Mrs. Phoenix for the great injustice done to her charms, I replied 'yes.' Judge of my horror when this low employee of a monopolizing company said with the tone and manner of an old acquaintance:

"Well, Sal, I guess you've done well, but I don't think his family will think much of the match!"

"Aint it wicked to rob dis chicken roost, Bob?" said a colored individual to his pal.

"Dat's a grent moral question, Sim; we hain't no time to argue it now. Hand down another pullet."

A lawyer on his death bed willed all his property to a lunatic asylum, stating as a reason for doing so, that he wished his property to return to the same class to people who had patronized him.

A parishioner inquired of his pastor the meaning of this line in Scripture—"He was clothed with curses as with garment." "It signifies," replied the Divine, "that the individual had got a habit of swearing."

A parson cornered a farmer whom he seldom was at his ministrations, by asking him directly after a little reproof of his sin of omission: "Shall we see you at church next Sabbath?"

"Yes," he replied, slowly, "Yes, I'll go or send a hand."

A Saw.—A man who had been vainly striving with an intensely dull tool to make an impression upon a stick of wood, suddenly abandoned his efforts, and with a countenance indicating unqualified amazement, was overheard to soliloquize thus: "Well, of all the saws that I ever saw saw, I never saw any other saw saw like this saw."

A Poetical genius in Wisconsin gets off a poem after the style of Longfellow, of which the following stanza is a specimen:

In the world's broad field of battle,
In the great barn yard of life
Ta not as lazy as cattle—
Be a rooster in the strife.

THE PARSE IN RUSSIA.—Alexander of Russia has followed the example of Napoleon of France, and after throwing the reins for a moment on the neck of that fiery steed, the Press, with an air worthy of Mr. Rary himself, has suddenly caught them up again and tightened them in his imperial grasp.

A crusty old bachelor says: "Tell me, thou mighty deep, with wave so blue and clear, is there a good time coming, when hoops will disappear? Some foreign rock bound shore—some island far away—where these tremendous street-balloons shall all be stowed away? The mighty deep was rippled by a squall, and very sadly answered, 'None at all.'"

A fellow was arrested for stealing ducks and after a description of them, the counsel for the prisoner said, "Why they can't be such a rare breed, for I have some of them in my own yard." "Very likely," said the complainant; "I have lost a good many ducks lately."

During the present Napoleon's reign the French have constructed railways to the extent of more than 4,500 miles.

NOAH is thought to have had on board a supply of "Exterminator," from the fact that for nearly six weeks he did not see a rat.

SENATOR DOUGLAS.—The New York Times says: "Senator Douglas, in spite of all the assaults made upon him, holds the only political position upon which the Democracy can hope to carry any considerable number of the Northern States. If he should be nominated by the Charleston convention, upon the Cincinnati platform, and with the aid or even assent of the Southern States, his election seems to be as certain as any contingent event can be. If he should carry the whole South, he would be certain to add enough Northern States to give him the election. If the ultra Southern States should bolt his nomination and put up a candidate of their own against him, that movement would give him three Northern votes where it would cost him one at the South."

Dr. Chapin, of New York, the celebrated Universalist preacher and lecturer, has had a house presented to him by the contributions of a few wealthy men of his congregation. It is situated in Thirty-fifth street, near Fifth avenue, and cost $24,000. The reverend gentleman, with his family, now occupies it, while his former residence in Eighth street, near Fifth avenue, has been advertised to let.

Mrs. Partington says she did not marry her second husband because she loved the male sex, but just because he was the size of her first protector, and could wear his old clothes out. Was his name Toodles?

"My dear Amelia," said a dandy, "I have long wished for this opportunity, but hardly dare speak now, for fear you will reject me; but I love you; say you will be mine! Your smiles would shed— and then he came to a pause 'your smiles would shed—' and he paused again. "Never mind the wood shed," says Amelia, "go on with the pretty talk."

A young lady who had lost, or mislaid her bean was advised to "hang up her fiddle." She said the advice did great violence to her heart-strings.

JONES, BUCKLEY & CO.

The Last Scenes of Washington's Life.

Irving's new life of Washington, in five volumes, has just been completed. In the fifth volume, after giving a succinct narrative of the administration of Washington, his retirement from office, and his mode of life at Mount Vernon, Mr. Irving brings the work to a close with the following description of the final scene:

Winter had now set in, with occasional wind, and rain, and frost, yet Washington still kept up his active round of indoor and outdoor vocations, as his diary records. He was in full health and vigor, dined out occasionally, and had frequent guests at Mount Vernon, and, as usual, was part of every day in the saddle, going the rounds of his estate, and in his military phraseology, "visiting the outposts."

He had recently walked with his favorite nephew about the grounds, showing the improvements he intended to make, and had especially pointed out the spot where he purposed building a new family vault, the old one being damaged by the roots of trees which had overgrown it and caused it to leak. "This change," said he, "I shall make the first of all, for I may require it before the rest."

"When I parted from him," added the nephew, "he stood on the steps of the front door where he took leave of myself and another. It was a bright frosty morning; he had taken his usual ride, and the clear healthy flush on his cheek, and his sprightly manner, brought the remark from both of us that we had never seen the General look so well. I have sometimes thought him decidedly the handsomest man I ever saw, and when in a lively mood, so full of pleasantry, so agreeable to all with whom he associated, that I could hardly realize he was the same Washington whose dignity awed all who approached him."

For some time past Washington had been occupied in digesting a complete system on which his estate was to be managed for several succeeding years; specifying the cultivation of the several farms, with tables designating the rotation of crops. It occupied thirty folio pages, and was executed with that clearness and method which characterized all his business papers. This was finished on the 10th of December, and was accompanied by a letter of that date to his manager or steward. It is a valuable document, showing the soundness and vigor of his intellect at this advanced stage of existence, and the love of order that reigned throughout his affairs. "My greatest anxiety," said he on a previous occasion, "is to have all these concerns in such a clear and distinct form that no reproach may attach itself to me when I have taken my departure for the land of spirits."

It was evident, however, that, full of health and vigor, he looked forward to his long cherished hope, the enjoyment of a serene old age in this home of his heart. According to his diary, the morning on which these voluminous instructions to his steward were dated was clear and calm, but the afternoon was lowering. The next day, (11th) he notes there was wind and rain, and "at night a large circle round the moon."

The morning of the 12th was overcast. That morning he wrote a letter to Hamilton, heartily approving of a plan for a military academy, which the latter had submitted to the Secretary of War.

About 10 o'clock he mounted his horse and rode out as usual to make the rounds of the estate. The ominous ring round the moon which he had observed on the preceding night, proved a fatal portent. "About 1 o'clock," he notes, "it began to snow, soon after to hail, and then turned to a settled cold rain." Having on an overcoat, he continued his ride without regarding the weather, and did not return to his house till after 3.

His Secretary approached him with letters to be franked, that they might be taken to the postoffice in the evening. Washington franked the letters, but observed that the weather was too bad to send a servant out with them. Mr. Lear perceived that snow was hanging from his hair, and expressed his fears that he had got wet; but he replied: "No, his great coat had kept him dry." As dinner had been waiting for him, he sat down to the table without changing his dress. "In the evening," writes his Secretary, "he appeared as well as usual."

On the following morning the snow was three inches deep and still falling, which prevented him from taking his usual ride. He complained of a sore throat, and had evidently taken cold the day before. In the afternoon the weather cleared up, and he went out on the grounds between the house and the river, to mark some trees which were to be cut down. A hoarseness which had hung about him through the day grew worse toward night, but he made light of it.

He was very cheerful in the evening, as he sat in the parlor with Mrs. Washington and Mr. Lear, amusing himself with the papers which had been brought from the post office. When he met with anything interesting or entertaining he would read it aloud as well as his hoarseness would permit, or he listened and made occasional comments while Mr. Lear read the dignified debates of the Virginia Assembly.

On retiring to bed, Mr. Lear suggested that he should take something to relieve his cold. "No," he replied, "you know I never take anything for a cold. Let it go as it came."

In the night he was extremely ill with ague, and difficulty of breathing. Between two and three o'clock in the morning, he awoke Mrs. Washington, who would have risen to call a servant, but he would not permit her, lest she should take cold. At daybreak, when the servant woman entered to make a fire, she was sent to call Mr. Lear. He found the General breathing with difficulty, and hardly able to utter a word intelligibly. Washington desired that Dr. Craik, who lived in Alexandria, should be sent for, and that in the meantime Rawlins, one of the overseers, should be summoned, to bleed him before the Doctor could arrive.

A gargle was prepared for his throat, but whenever he attempted to swallow any of it he was convulsed and almost suffocated. Rawlins made his appearance soon after sunrise, but when the General's arm was ready for the operation, became agitated. "Don't be afraid," said the General, as well as he could speak. Rawlins made an incision. "The orifice is not large enough," said Washington. The blood, however, ran pretty freely, and Mrs. Washington, uncertain whether the treatment was proper, and fearful that too much blood might be taken, begged Mr. Lear to stop it. When he was about to untie the string, the General put up his hand to prevent him, and as soon as he could speak, murmured "more, more," but Mrs. Washington's efforts prevailed, and the bleeding was stopped, after about half a pint of blood had been taken. External applications were now made to the throat, and his feet were bathed in warm water, but without affording any relief.

His old friend Dr. Craik, arrived between eight and nine, and two other physicians, Drs. Dick and Brown, were called in. Various remedies were tried, and additional bleeding, but of no avail.

"About half-past four o'clock," writes Mr. Lear, "he desired me to call Mrs. Washington to his bedside, when he requested her to go down into his room, and take from his desk two wills which she would find there, and bring them to him, which she did. Upon looking at them, he gave her one, which he observed was useless, as being superseded by the other, and desired her to burn it, which she did, and took the other and put it into her closet."

"After this was done, I returned to his bedside and took his hand. He said to me: 'I find I am going; my breath cannot last long. I believed from the first that the disorder would prove fatal. Do you arrange all my military letters and papers. Arrange my accounts and settle my books, as you know more about them than any one else; and let Mr. Rawlins finish recording my other letters which he has begun.' I told him this would be done. He then asked me if I recollected anything which it was essential for him to do, as he had a very short time to continue with us. I told him that I could recollect nothing; but that I hoped he was not so near his end. He observed, smiling, that he certainly was, and that as it was the debt which we must all pay, he looked to the event with perfect resignation."

In the course of the afternoon he appeared to be in great pain and distress from the difficulty of breathing, and frequently changed his posture in the bed. Mr. Lear endeavored to raise him and turn him with as much ease as possible. "I am afraid I fatigue you too much," the General would say. Upon being assured to the contrary—"Well," observed he, gratefully, "it is a debt we must all pay to each other, and I hope when you want aid of this kind you will find it."

His servant Christopher had been in the room during the day, and almost the whole time on his feet. The General noticed it in the afternoon, and kindly told him to sit down. About 5 o'clock his old friend Dr. Craik, came again into the room and approached the bedside.

"Doctor," said the General, "I die hard, but I am not afraid to go. I believed, from my first attack, that I should not survive it—my breath cannot last long." The doctor pressed his hand in silence, retired from the bedside, and sat by the fire, absorbed in grief.

Between five and six the other physicians came in, and he was assisted to sit up in his bed. "I feel I am going," said he; "I thank you for your attentions, but I pray you to take no more trouble about me; let me go off quietly; I cannot last long." He lay down again; all retired except Dr. Craik. The General continued uneasy and restless, but without complaining, frequently asking what hour it was.

Further remedies were tried without avail in the evening. He took whatever was offered him, did as he was desired by the physicians, and never uttered a sigh or complaint.

"About ten o'clock," writes Mr. Lear, "he made several attempts to speak to me before he could effect it. At length he said, 'I am just going. Have me decently buried; and do not let my body be put into the Vault in less than three days after I am dead.' I bowed assent, for I could not speak. He then looked at me again and said, 'Do you understand me?' I replied, yes. 'Tis well,' said he."

"About ten minutes before he expired (which was between ten and eleven o'clock, on the night of December 14, 1799,) his breathing became easier. He lay quietly; he withdrew his hand from mine and felt his own pulse. I saw his countenance change. I spoke to Dr. Craik, who sat by the fire. He came to the bedside. The General's hand fell from his wrist. I took it in mine and pressed it to my bosom. Dr. Craik put his hand over his eyes, and he expired without a struggle or a sigh."

"While we were fixed in silent grief, Mrs. Washington, who was seated at the foot of the bed, asked with a firm and collected voice, 'Is he gone?' I could not speak, but held up my hand as a signal that he was no more. 'Tis well,' said she, in the same voice. 'All is now over; I shall soon follow him; I have no more trials to pass through.'"

How Louis Napoleon wooed, but did not win.

It may be interesting, says the Home Journal, to republish the following extract from a conversation with Fenimore Cooper, in 1855, recorded at the time by Mr. Willis, then in Paris.

"I was calling upon Lafayette one day (said Mr. Cooper,) and was let in by his confidential servant, who, it struck me, showed signs of having something to conceal. He said his master was at home, and after a moment's hesitation, made way for me to go on, as usual, to his private room; but I saw there was some embarrassment. I walked in, and found the General alone. He received me with some cordiality as ever, but inquired with some eagerness who let me in, and whether I met an old acquaintance going out. I told him that his servant had admitted me, and that was something peculiar in the man's manner; but as I had seen no one else, I knew nothing more."

"Ah," said the General, "that fellow, put him in the side room. Sit down, and I will tell you. Prince Louis Napoleon Bonaparte was here two minutes ago."

"I expressed my surprise, of course, for this was in '33, when it was death for a Bonaparte to enter France."

"Yes," continued the General, "and he came with a proposition. He wishes to marry my grand-daughter Clementine, unite the Republicans and Imperialists, and make himself Emperor, and make my grand-daughter Empress?"

"And, if it be not an indecent question," I said "what was your answer, my dear General?"

"I told him, said Lafayette, that my family had the American notion of that subject, and chose husbands themselves—that there was the young lady—he might go court her, and if she liked him, I had no objection."

Mr. Cooper did not tell us (for of course he did not know) how the Prince plied his wooing, nor why he failed. The fair Clementine, who thus, possibly, lost her chances of being an Empress, married M. de Beaumont, and now represents her rejected admirer as the French Ambassador at the Court of Austria. Shortly after this visit to Lafayette, Mr. Cooper was in London and mentioned to the Princess (the widow of the elder brother of the President of France) this venture of Prince Louis into the den of the Orleansists. "He is mad!" was the only reply."

MARY STUART ACCORDING TO LAMARTINE.—If another were to arise, and if the poet were to seek another Helen for the subject of a modern epic of war, religion and love, he would beyond all doubt find her in Mary Stuart, the most beautiful, the weakest, attractive and most attracted of women, raising around her, by her irresistible fascinations, a whirlwind of love, ambition and jealousy, in which her lovers became, each in his turn, the motive, the instrument, and the victim of a crime; leaving, like the Greek Helen, the arms of a murdered husband for those of his murderer, sowing the seeds of internecine, religious and foreign war at every step, and closing by a saintly death the life of a Clitemnestra, leaving behind her indistinct memories, exaggerated equality by Protestant and Catholic parties, the former interested in condemning her for all the latter absolving her from all, as if the same factions who had fought for her during her life had resolved to continue the combat after her death! Such was Mary Stuart.

REMEMBRANCE.

I will remember thee,—in that still hour
When, like a dream of beauty, from
The west,
Heaven's sweetest star sheds down her Golden bow
Of light upon the waters,—whose un-

And moodiness might well be charmed
away,
By the pure loveliness of that soft ray!

I will remember thee,—when night hath thrown
Its dreams around the sleeper, and repose
Hath calmed the worn and aching spirit
down
To brief oblivion of its waking woes;
Then,—when deep silence reigneth over all,
My lonely thoughts thine image shall recall.

I will remember thee,—when morn bath brought
Her banner on the hills,—and kindling
gleams
Of sunlight, in warm diamond showers are flung
Upon the surface of the bounding
stream,
Which move in their exulting course
along,
Free as the murmurs of their own wild song.

I will remember thee,—when summer's sigh
Breathes o'er the mountains, and the laughing earth
Is zoned with roses,—while deep melody
Hath in the woods, with the wild flowers its birth
From joyous birds, who mid their green
bosoms there
Pour forth their music on the clear blue air.

I will remember thee,—through many a scene
Of pleasantness and solitude,—for thou
Upon my dark and troubled path hast been
A vision blest and cheering,—as the

That spans the thunder-cloud: a thing of light,
As early hope's first dreamings pure and

ELIZA ACTON.

The Abolition Invasion of Harper's Ferry—A Lesson
from the Slaves.

Many of the country journals,
either from a want of wit or a want
of honesty, insist upon calling the invasion of Harper's Ferry by a score of black and white abolitionists from
the North a slave insurrection.

If there is any one point in the late proceedings of Ossawatimie Brown, of Kansas notoriety, that is
more prominent than any other, it
is the singular fact that none of the Southern slaves were mixed up in
the affair, nor did a single one of
them voluntarily come forward to accept the great advantages which Brown and his fellow fanatics in the North held out to them. Within a circuit of a few hours' ride of Harper's Ferry fully five thousand slaves reside; but not a sign of discontent was exhibited.

Brown had been busy for months, and there, his means of communication were established, the
underground railroad has its stations
all along to the Canada frontier,
and J. R. G. was a willing contributor from Ashtabula, Gerrit Smith applauded the "Kansas work" from Peterboro, F. B. S. sympathized in Concord, and many a scattering abolitionist all through the Northern States, no doubt, wrestled in prayer
that the slave might be freed from his bonds.

But the deportment of the slaves
has shown that they possess a very correct appreciation of the mismanaged advantages of Northern freedom.
They know very well that all this mock philanthropy exerts itself merely to run them off from their comfortable Southern homes to leave
them to starve in the cold and inhospitable wilderness of Canada. When we compare the condition of the free negro at the North with that of the slave at the South, we cannot be surprised that Cuffy should prefer

to remain in slavery. In the North,
everywhere, the negro ceases to awaken the least sympathy for his suffering in the hearts of the abolitionists; they cease to care in any way
for his necessities, they refuse to admit
him to their houses or churches, they will not sit by his side in the cars
or at table, they reject him as a mechanic, a servant, or a laborer, and
persecute him with neglect till he
sinks to the very dregs of society,
and dies in misery.

In the South his condition is widely different. It is true he is held in slavery, but negro slavery is a condition patriarchal servitude. From birth the negro is in close and intimate contact with the white man. His childhood is cared for, his youth is instructed in some useful labor, and
all through the maturity and decline
of manhood, his master and himself
work for the same family interest,
until, in his old age, he is a family
pensioner secure from want. In this lifelong intercourse between the white and the black, between the
master and the slave, the inferior
has the benefit of the control and guidance of the superior intellect. Through this stimulus, and this example his morals are improved, his industry is increased, and in every
way he is a better member of society
than the vicious free negro of the North or the liberated barbarian of
the tropics. Eloquent proof of this fact is found in the advice of one of
the Presidents of Liberia to the Colonization Society:—"Send us slaves
from the South, liberated after they have attained to manhood, for they
make better citizens and more industrious people than the negroes
from the North.

The close intercourse between
the two races that exists under the patriarchal institutions of the South
can never be obtained under any other system of society. Nowhere else will the white lend his efforts
to teach the black, nowhere else will
the black unite his physical labor
with the intellectual effort of the white for their common benefit, nowhere else will the superior admit
the inferior race to the advantage
of close family contact, as nurses,
housekeepers, handmaidens, and not seldom as fosterbrothers. Nowhere else will the white labor side by side
with the negro in the open field,
guiding his ignorance, bearing with
his incapacity, and rectifying his errors or neglect. It would be well
for the fanatics who wish to dissolve
this great social tie in Southern society, through the shedding of blood
or the cheat of Northern freedom
for the negro, to learn a lesson from
the refusal of the slaves in and around Harper's Ferry to accept the boon
held out to them through the abolition
invasion of old John Brown of Oss-
awatimie.—New York Herald.

"CARRY ME BACK TO OLD VIRGIN-NY."—The Lynchburg (Va.) Republican, of Wednesday last says:

On Sunday last, a crowd of not less
than a thousand negroes assembled
on the basin to take leave of the negroes belonging to the estate of the late Mrs. Frances B. Shackelford, of Amherst county, who, in accordance with the will of the deceased, were about to depart by way of the canal, for a free state. The whole number set free was forty-four, men, women and children, but only thirty-seven left, the balance preferring to remain in servitude in Old Virginia, rather than enjoy their freedom elsewhere.
Some of those who did leave, were thrown on the boat by main force,
so much opposed were they to leaving,
and many expressed their determination of returning to Virginia as soon as an opportunity offered. Many were the well wishers tendered the departing negroes by the crowd assembled, and when the boats started from their wharves,
the freed negroes struck up "Carry
me back to Old Virginia," which
was joined in by one and all.

The largest bar of gold ever
brought to this country was received
on Friday, by the exchange bank of New York, from California, by the steamer Star of the West. It weighed 2,227 ounces, was 12 inches long,
6 inches deep, and 4 inches wide,
and $43,226. It has been said for shipment to England.

The Great Trotting Match at Kalamazoo.

Flora Temple makes the fastest
time on record.

We find in the Detroit Advertiser
the following account of the trot on Saturday at the National Course at Kalamazoo:

Flora Temple was the first of the competitors brought up. Her blanket was taken off, and when her name was announced a tremendous
shout was sent up for the "little bay
mare." The "mysterious" mare Princess was the next that appeared, and she was greeted almost as warmly, which was also the case with Honest Anee, a sorrel gelding. These were the only entries for the race,
the owner of Ike Cook, for some reason or other, objecting to the entry
of his horse. The horses were called up to take their places, when in drawing for position, Honest Anee got the inside, Princess came next, and the outside was Flora Temple. The race was for a proprietor's premium
of $2,000, mile heats, best three in five.

FIRST HEAT.—The horses made
two false starts, but at the tap of the drum they got off. As soon as they passed the score, Flora took the lead, Honest Anee next, with Princess in the rear. They continued in their relative positions all the way round,
though on entering the home stretch,
around the turn, Flora was far ahead
of both the others; while Anee continued to widen the gap between him
and Princess until the score was reached. Time 2:32. Flora passed the first quarter pole in 0:36, the half mile pole in 1:11, and the third quarter pole in 2:09.

At the end of this heat, Mr. Eoff,
the owner of Princess, stated that his
mare was very much frightened, and
before the start had hurt one of her fore knees. He did not wish to have her trot the second heat, but the judges insisted. Princess was in bad condition, breaking continually, and
appeared to have been affected badly
by her season's business.

SECOND HEAT.—Several false starts
were made, but finally at the tap of the bell they went off well, Flora
again taking the lead on the start,
distantly her competitors, and making the heat in 2:22, one second
less than her celebrated heat at Cincinnati on the 7th inst. She made the quarter-mile in 0:37, and the
half mile in 1:11, the same as on the first heat. Anee coming in second, made the mile in 2:38. The time
of Princess, who was estimated to have been about 216 yards behind
Flora, was not kept. The owner of Princess, who had been watching attentively the movements of Honest
Anee, at the close of the second heat purchased him for $2,000, and withdrew him from the race.

Mr. McMann the owner and driver
of Flora, now promised that if possible the little mare should beat
her Cincinnati time. The mare was being walked up and down the track;
she appeared in excellent condition,
her beautiful eyes—which by the
way, are the only beautiful things
about her—sparkled, and the speculators rushed to an intense pitch of excitement, crowded around to catch a glimpse of the little prodigy. It was
with the greatest difficulty that the
space in front of the stand could be cleared, in order to bring her and Princess up for the

THIRD HEAT.—One false start
was made, when it being seen that
with the condition Princess was in,
she could do but little, it was agreed that the mares should start, whether together or not. Princess broke on the score, and no attempt was made
to force her; her driver taking it
leisurely around the course. It was different with Flora, however; who
at the start jumped into her work
and went like a whirlwind. Every one who witnessed the start, was confident that McMann would keep his part of the agreement, if Flora would
let him, and she seeming to understand the thing, nerved herself for
the work. Her feet pattered along faster than ever before, the wheels
of the sulky rolled lightning-fast, and
the first quarter was made in 35 seconds; the half mile 1:09, and the mile
in 2:19; being one second and three quarters quicker than ever before made.
As she came down the home stretch
her driver touched her lightly a few times with his whip, and with a few

words of encouragement, such as
"go along Flora," "beat yourself Flora," "remember Cincinnati," the
mare and driver passed the stand like
a flash, receiving as they passed such
a round of applause as never before
greeted them. The judges announced the time 2:19, when a scene followed which baffled all description.
The judges threw their hats in the air, reporter dropped note book and pencil, and gave vent to their feelings, young and beautiful maid-ens waved their bonnets and handkerchiefs, and gave sweet utterance
to their delight, married ladies slapped their husbands on the backs, and
cried "ain't it great," the husbands
embraced their wives and answered
excellently owners of medium-fast horses wanted to sell, and invest in
"Flora," while all cheered most lusti-
ly. As soon as a partial quiet could be restored, the judges announced
that "Flora Temple has won the race
and the $2,000; let us give three cheers for the 'little bay mare,' and
three for the driver." The crowd responded heartily with unanymous
cheers and a tiger, and the Kalamazoo National Horse Fair was at an end.

Singular and Extraordinary
Case of Arson.

About three years ago, the daughter of a poor German painter came
to this country with her parents.
Some three weeks since she entered the family of Mr. Napoleon Bancroft on Marshall street, Philadelphia, as a domestic. She very soon won for herself the good opinions of
Mr. Bancroft and his family, and was esteemed faithful, kind, diligent and obliging, although subsequent revelations proved her to be a girl of extraordinary cunning and depravity.
About the time she became fully domesticated, the family missed several articles of value, and discovered traces of wanton mischief in many parts of the house. Silk frocks of Mrs. Bancroft, and several valuable
articles of wearing apparel belonging to her husband, were found to have been cut by scissors or otherwise irreparably injured.

The good opinion entertained by
the family of the domestic, turned their suspicions from her. By a characteristic exhibition of cunning,
she managed to fasten all the blame
on a little son of Mr. Bancroft, named John, not more than four years of age. In consequence of these charges,
little Johnny was subjected to repeated and severe punishments,
and was at times confined in a room
tied to a bedpost with a rope. After denying the allegations of his parents,
time and again, the son, with a hope
of escaping punishment, was induced
to confess the charges made by the servant girl.

This state of things continued for
some two or three weeks, when on
last Tuesday afternoon the house of Mr. Bancroft was discovered to be on fire. It originated in a lot of clothing
had been stowed away in a closet,
and were discovered by the German
girl. She gave the alarm to Mr.
Bancroft at his office, on Gran avenue, saying at the same time that little Johnny had done it. While she was gone, another fire broke out,
which, with the other, was easily extinguished. A half hour afterwards
a third fire was discovered in a closet,
and before those flames had been
quenched, two other fires of a similar character were discovered in various parts of the house, making no
less than five fires within two hours.
All these fires were discovered by
the servants, and charged on little Johnny.

During the excitement consequent
upon extinguishing these fires, a friend of the family, named John W.
Boileau, entered. After assisting to drown the flames, and examining the
premises, he became convinced that Johnny was innocent and that the girl was the culpable party. He succeeded in convincing the parents of Johnny that his suspicions were correct, and charged the girl with the commission of the crime. She made a partial acknowledgement of her guilt, and the circumstances were reported to Fire Marshal Blackburn.
She was arrested by Constable Johnson, and underwent a most searching
and severe examination at the hands
of the Fire Marshal, who came to the conclusion arrived at by Mr. Boileau.

On being taken to the Alderman's
office, she made a full confession to
the Marshal, and committed to answer the charge. In this confession
she admitted herself to be the author
of all the mischief for which poor
Johnny had been punished.

After the hearing, the girl was taken to Dr. Haynes, the phrenolo-gist, who made an examination of her head. The result of this examination, as reported to us, exemplified in a strong way, the teachings of the science of phrenology. The moral faculties were diminished, while the sensual strongly predominated. The organs of acquisitiveness, destructiveness,
and the sensual organs were very largely developed, while veneration and benevolence were almost entirely obliterated. This case in all its singular and extraordinary features, exhibits an instance of a mono-
mania to commit crime, and a total
want of moral force, rarely equalled
in the annals of criminal jurisprudence.—[Phil. Press.]

The Runaway Yacht
Wanderer.

The following, which we take from
the Savannah (Ga.) News, is an account of the larceny of the yacht Wanderer from the harbor of that
city:

The following is the history of the transaction: On Tuesday, persons on
the lower bay observed that the Wanderer was taking stores on board,
and on the same afternoon her sails were bent. On Tuesday evening, Lamar, her owner, who had been absent and but just returned to the city,
met Collector Boston, and stated to
him that he had reason to suspect
that Capt. Martin, who had been negotiating with him for an interest in
the Wanderer, and who, it seems,
had assumed the command of her,
intended to steal the vessel, and requested that he would instruct the officers of the Cutter to keep close watch on her. Boston informed Lamar that the Cutter had gone to sea,
and that he had no means of preventing the vessel from leaving the harbor, but that he would endeavor to port would afford him.

On Wednesday morning the Wanderer having disappeared during the night, Mr. Lamar called on Mr.
Boston and notified him of the fact,
and asked him to write to the American Consul at Havana, and to others, advising them of the escape, and Lamar subsequently returned to the Custom House and said to Boston that the Wanderer was
aground in the river, and requested
him to furnish a steamer to go in pursuit of her. Mr. Boston informed Lamar that it was a new case in his experience, that the escape was a violation of the revenue laws, but it was his property that had been stolen—Mr. Lamar's—that he did not feel authorized, the Cutter not being
at his command, to contract a debt
on the part of the Government, to recover his vessel, at the same time
informing him that if he would procure a steamer to go in pursuit of the Wanderer, he would instruct an officer of the Revenue to accompany
them, and that he would lay the matter before the Government, and if payment of the expenses incurred
were refused, he—Mr. Lamar—
would be responsible.

The interview between Boston and Lamar took place about nine o'clock,
a.m., at which time the Wanderer
was seen from the Exchange steeple,
aground, not far from Tybee. Mr.
Lamar procured the steam tug Columbus, and accompanied by two custom house officers, with a number
of friends, well armed, among whom
were several who had sold ship supplies to the Wanderer, yet to be paid for, left the city at 15 minutes
past 10 o'clock, in pursuit. From the steeple of the Exchange the Wanderer was seen to get under way
about half-past 11 o'clock, and on
the arrival of the Columbus at Tybee, at half-past 12, the yacht, having a favorable wind was entirely
out of sight. No doubt that vessel has gone to the coast of Africa to take in another cargo, and it looks
very much as though the whole matter was arranged with Lamar and
connived at by him.

Says St. Evermond, "A woman's last sighs are for her beauty."

Army Intelligence.

The War Department having made the following decision in reference to quarters for chaplains in the army, has caused the same to be published for the information of all concerned:—

An appropriate set of quarters,
equal to the allowance of a captain,
will be set apart permanently for the chaplain, and he will not be disturbed in them, except by reducing the allowance, and only then when the quarters of the garrison are insufficient; he will not be entirely displaced from them, nor will he be allowed to choose quarters elsewhere.

A General Court Martial has been ordered to assemble at Fort Vancouver, W. T., by direction of General W. S. Harney, commanding the Department of Oregon, for the trial of Brevet Major F. O. Wyse, Captain Third artillery, and such other delinquents as may be brought before the court. Colonel George Wright, Ninth infantry, is detailed as President, and Captain George E. Pickett, Ninth infantry, as Judge Advocate, of the court.

The commanding officer of Fort Buchanan having represented to Colonel Bonneville, commanding the Department of New Mexico, that the Indians in that vicinity were continually committing depredations,
Col. Bonneville has caused a detachment of two hundred and fifty troops, composed of cavalry and infantry, to be detailed for the purpose of chas-tising those marauding Indians. The command will rendezvous near the overland mail route, on the San Pedro river, and will be commanded by Brevet Lieut. Colonel J. V. D.
Reeve, Eighth Infantry.

Lieut. J. L. K. Smith, corps of Topographical Engineers, assigned to duty on the survey of the Lakes, and will report for that duty to Captain Meade, Topographical Engineers, at Detroit, Michigan.

An extension of leave of absence
has been granted the following officers:—To Lieutenant R. R. Garland, Tenth Infantry, six months;
to Mr. J. W. Second Cavalry, four months; and to Lieut. Slaughter, First Artillery, three months.

THE INSURRECTION IN TENNESSEE.
—The Memphis Avalanche makes quite a sensation story of the arrest and trial in that city of Palmer, charged with being implicated in Brown's insurrection. Palmer was discovered by two letters, one of them addressed to "Capt. John Brown, Harper's Ferry, Md.," which he dropped accidentally on the cars between New York and Philadelphia, on the 22d of October. A traveler picked the letters up and sent them to Gov. Wise, and Gov. Wise sent them to Gov.
Harris, of Tennessee. The latter put the detectives on the track of Palmer, who arrested him on his farm, or rather
the farm of his wife, in Shelby County, Tennessee. One of the letters dropped by him is addressed to Capt.
Brown, and written by Lawrence Thatcher, who says that Palmer had married a wealthy widow lady in Tennessee, so as to secure the confidence of Southern men, and to secure her negroes, whom he intended to arm, as the nucleus of an army of blacks, with which he would march against Memphis. He was to be aided by friends at Cincinnati, and was to excite insurrection in Tennessee and Arkansas.

A few days since an officer
in the Stage House at Springfield received a letter inclosing a one dollar Wisconsin bill, for services rendered by him. The letter inclosing
the bill ran in this way:

"Inclosed please find one dollar which carries evidence of its having been used once before in an official capacity. I send you this bill, thinking it may afford you moments of fun, by seeing how thundering mean a mean man can be."

The one dollar bill mentioned
"carried" on the back of it the following, written in a plain and elegant hand:

"This one dollar bill is all I received for performing the marriage ceremony between John Gibbs and Mary Wallace, of the town of Salem, Kenosha county, Wis., after having traveled five miles in the cold and paid $2.50 for livery."

from the Slaves.

Many of the country journals,
from a want of wit or a want
of honesty, insist upon calling the invasion of Harper's Ferry a score
of black and white abolitionists from
the North a slave insurrection.

If there is any one point in the proceedings of Ossawatimie
Brown, of Kansas notoriety, that is
more prominent than any other, it
is the singular fact that none of the Southern slaves were mixed up in
the affair, nor did a single one of
them voluntarily come forward to
accept the great advantages which
Brown and his fellow fanatics in the North held out to them. Within the circuit of a few hours' ride of Harper's Ferry fully five thousand
slaves reside; but not a sign of disturbance or discontent was exhibited.

Yet Brown had been busy for months round there, his means of communication were established, the
underground railroad has its stations
along to the Canada frontier,
and J. R. G. was a willing contributor from Ashtabula, Gerrit Smith
plauded the "Kansas work" from Peterboro, E. B. S. sympathized in accord, and many a scattering abolitionist all through the Northern States; no doubt, wrestled in prayer
for the slave might be freed from
his bonds.

But the deportment of the slaves
shown that they possess a very true appreciation of the misnamed
advantages of Northern freedom.

They know very well that all this
"philanthropy" exerts itself
merely to run them off from their
comfortable Southern homes to leave
them to starve in the cold and inhospit-
able wilderness of Canada. When they compare the condition of the free and colored at the North with that of the

surprised that Cuffy should prefer
to remain in slavery. In the North,
everywhere, the negro ceases to
awaken the least sympathy for his suffering in the hearts of the aboli-tionists; they cease to care in any way
for his necessities, they refuse to admit
him to their houses or churches, they
will not sit by his side in the cars
or at table, they reject him as a mechanic, a servant, or a laborer, and
persecute him with neglect till he
sinks to the very dregs of society,
and dies in misery.

In the South his condition is widely different. It is true he is held in slavery, but negro slavery is a conditional patriarchal servitude. From birth the negro is in close and intimate
contact with the white man. His childhood is cared for, his youth is
instructed in some useful labor, and
all through the maturity and decline
of manhood, his master and himself
work for the same family interest,
until, in his old age, he is a family
pensioner secure from want. In this lifelong intercourse between the
white and the black, between the
master and the slave, the inferior
has the benefit of the control and
guidance of the superior intellect.—
Through this stimulus and this example his morals are improved, his
industry is increased, and in every
way he is a better member of society
than the vicious free negro of the North or the liberated barbarian of
the tropics. Eloquent proof of this fact is found in the advice of one of
the Presidents of Liberia to the Col-
onization Society:—"Send us slaves
from the South, liberated after they
have attained to manhood, for they
make better citizens and more industrious people than the negroes
from the North.

The close intercourse between
the two races that exists under the
patriarchal institutions of the South
can never be obtained under any other system of slavery. The white man who leads his efforts
to teach the black, nowhere else will
the black unite his physical labor
with the intellectual effort of the
white for their common benefit, no-
where else will the superior admit
the inferior race to the advantage
of close family contact, as nurses,
housekeepers, handmaidens, and not
seldom as fosterbrothers. Nowhere
else will the white labor side by side
with the negro in the open field,
guiding his ignorance, bearing with
his incapacity, and rectifying his
errors or neglect. It would be well
for the fanatics who wish to dissolve
this great social tie in Southern society, through the shedding of blood
or the cheat of Northern freedom
for the negro, to learn a lesson from
the refusal of the slaves in and around Harper's Ferry to accept the boon
held out to them through the abolition
invasion of old John Brown of Oss-
awatimie.—New York Herald.

"CARRY ME BACK TO OLD VIRGINIA."
—The Lynchburg (Va.) Republican, of Wednesday last says:

On Sunday last, a crowd of not less
than a thousand negroes assembled
on the basin to take leave of the negroes belonging to the estate of the late Mrs. Frances B.
Shackelford, of Amherst county, who,
in accordance with the will of the deceased, were about to depart by way of the canal, for a free state. The whole number set free was forty-four;
men, women and children, but only thirty-seven left, the balance preferring to remain in servitude in Old Virginia, rather than enjoy their freedom elsewhere. Some of those who did leave, were thrown on the boat
by main force, so much opposed were they to leaving, and many expressed their determination of returning to Virginia as soon as an opportunity offered. Many were the well wishes tendered the departing negroes
by the crowd assembled, and when the boats started from their wharves,
the freed negroes struck up "Carry
me back to Old Virginia," which
was joined in by one and all.

The largest bar of gold ever
brought to this country was received
on Friday, by the exchange bank of
New York from California, by the steamer Star of the West. It weighed
2,227 ounces, was 12 inches long,
6 inches deep, and 4 inches wide,
and $43,226. It has been said for shipment to England.

The Great Trotting Match at Kalamazoo.

Flora Temple makes the fastest
time on record.

We find in the Detroit Advertiser
the following account of the trot on Saturday at the National Course at Kalamazoo:
Flora Temple was the first of the compositors brought up. Her blanket was taken off, and when her
name was announced a tremendous
shout was sent up for the "little bay
mare." The "mysterious" mare Princess was the next that appear-
ed, and she was greeted almost as
warmly, which was also the case with Honest Ance, a sorrel gelding.—
These were the only entries for the race, the owner of Ike Cook, for some reason or other, objecting to the entry
of his horse. The horses were called up to take their places, when in drawing for position, Honest Ance got the inside, Princess came next, and on the outside was Flora Temple. The
race was for a proprietor's premium
of $2,000, mile heats, best three in
five.

First Heat.—The horses made
two false starts, but at the top of the draw they got off. As soon as they passed the score, Flora took the lead, Honest Ance next, with Princess in the rear. They continued in their
relative positions all the way round,
though on entering the home stretch,
around the turn, Flora was far ahead
of both the others, while Ance continued to widen the gap between him
and Princess until the score was reached. Time 2:32. Flora passed the first quarter pole in 0:36, the half mile pole in 1:11, and the third quarter pole in 2:09.

At the end of this heat, Mr. Eoff,
the owner of Princess, stated that his
mare was very much frightened, and
before the start had hurt one of her
fore knees. He did not wish to have her run again. Princess was in bad condition, breaking continually, and
appeared to have been affected badly
by her season's business.

Second Heat.—Several false starts
were made, but finally at the top of
the bell they went off well, Flora
again taking the lead on the start,
distancing her competitors, and making the heat in 2:22, one second
less than her celebrated heat at Cincinnati on the 7th inst. She made
the quarter-mile in 0:37, and the
half mile in 1:11, the same as on the first heat. Ance coming in second,
made the mile in 2:33. The time
of Princess, who was estimated to
have been about 216 yards behind
Flora, was not kept. The owner of Princess, who had been watching at-
tentively the movements of Honest
Ance, at the close of the second heat
purchased him for $2,000, and with-
drew him from the race.

Mr. McMann the owner and driver
of Flora, now promised that if
possible the little mare should beat
her Cincinnati time. The mare was
being walked up and down the track;
she appeared in excellent condition,
her beautiful eyes—which by the
way, are the only beautiful things
about her—sparkled, and the spectators roused to an intense pitch of excitement, crowded around to catch a glimpse of the little prodigy. It was
with the greatest difficulty that the
space in front of the stand could be
cleared, in order to bring her, and Princess up for the

Third Heat.—One false start
was made, when it being seen that
with the condition Princess was in,
she could do but little, it was agreed
that the mares should start, whether
together or not. Princess broke on
the score, and no attempt was made
to force her; her driver taking it
leisurely around the course. It was different with Flora, however; who
at the start jumped into her work
and went like a whirlwind. Every one who witnessed the start, was confident that McMann would keep his
part of the agreement, if Flora would
let him, and she seeming to understand the thing, nerved herself for
the work. Her feet pattered along
faster than ever before, the wheels
of the sulky rolled lightning-fast, and
the first quarter was made in 35 seconds, the half mile 1:09, and the mile
in 2:19; being one second and three
quarters quicker than ever before made.
As she came down the home stretch
her driver touched her lightly a few
times with his whip, and with a few

words of encouragement, such as
"go along Flora," "beat yourself
Flora," "remember Cincinnati," the
mare and driver passed the stand like
a flash, receiving as they passed such
a round of applause as never before
greeted them. The judges announced the time 2:19, when a scene followed which baffled all description.
The judges threw their hats in the air, reporter dropped note book, pencil, and gave vent to their feelings, young and beautiful maid-ens waved their bouquets and handkerchiefs, and gave sweet utterance
to their delight, married ladies slap-
ped their husbands on the backs, and
cried "ain't it great," the husbands
embraced their wives and answered
"excellent," owners of medium-fast
horses wanted to sell, and invest in
"Flora," while all cheered most lusti-
ly. As soon as a partial quiet could
be restored, the judges announced
that "Flora Temple has won the race
and the $2,000; let us give three
cheers for the 'little bay mare,' and
three for the driver." The crowd responded heartily, with unanimous cheer and a tiger, and the Kalamazoo National Horse Fair was at an
end.

Singular and Extraordinary Case of Arson.

About three years ago, the daughter of a poor German painter came
to this country with her parents.—
Some three weeks since she entered the family of Mr. Napoleon Bancroft on Marshall street, Philadelphia, as a domestic. She very soon
won for herself the good opinions of
Mr. Bancroft and his family, and was esteemed faithful, kind, diligent and obliging, although subsequent revelations proved her to be a girl of extraordinary cunning and depravity.
About the time she became fully domesticated, she discovered the
traces of wanton mischief in many parts of the house. Silk frocks of
Mrs. Bancroft, and several valuable
articles of wearing apparel belonging to her husband, were found to have been cut by scissors or otherwise irreparably injured.

The good opinion entertained by
the family of the domestic, turned
their suspicions from her. By a characteristic exhibition of canting,
she managed to fasten all the blame
on a little son of Mr. Bancroft, named John, not more than four years of
age. In consequence of these charges,
little Johnny was subjected to repeated and severe punishments,
and was at times confined in a room
tied to a bedpost with a rope. After
denying the allegations of his parents,
time and again, the son, with a hope
of escaping punishment, was induced
to confess the charges made by the
servant girl.

This state of things continued for
some two or three weeks, when on
last Tuesday afternoon the house of
Mr. Bancroft was discovered to be on
fire. It originated in a lot of clothing
had been stowed away in a closet,
and were discovered by the German
girl. She gave the alarm to Mr.
Bancroft at his office, on Grun avenue, saying at the same time that little Johnny had done it. While she
was gone, another fire broke out,
which, with the other, was easily extinguished. A half hour afterwards
a third fire was discovered in a closet,
and before those flames had been
quenched, two other fires of a similar character were discovered in various parts of the house, making no
less than five fires within two hours.
All these fires were discovered by
the servants, and charged on little Johnny.

During the excitement consequent
upon extinguishing these fires, a
friend of the family, named John W.
Boileau, entered. After assisting to
drown the flames, and examining the
premises, he became convinced that Johnny was innocent and that the
girl was the culpable party. He succeeded in convincing the parents of Johnny that his suspicions were correct, and charged the girl with the commission of the crime. She made a partial acknowledgment of her
guilt, and the circumstances were reported to Fire Marshal Blackburn.
She was arrested by Constable John-
son, and underwent a most searching
and severe examination at the hands
of the Fire Marshal, who came to the conclusion arrived at by Mr. Boileau.

On being taken to the Alderman's
office, she made a full confession to
the Marshal, and committed to answer the charge. In this confession
she admitted herself to be the author
of all the mischief for which poor
Johnny had been punished.

After the hearing, the girl was
taken to Dr. Haynes, the phrenolo-
gist, who made an examination of her head. The result of this examination, as reported to us, exemplified in a strong way, the teachings of the science of phrenology. The moral faculties were diminished, while the sensual strongly predominated. The organs of acquisitiveness, destructiv-ness, and the sensual organs were very largely developed, while veneration and benevolence were almost entirely obliterated. This case in all
its singular and extraordinary features, exhibits an instance of a mono-
mania to commit crime, and a total
want of moral force, rarely equalled
in the annals of criminal jurispru-
dence.—[Phil. Press,

The Runaway Yacht Wanderer.

The following, which we take from
the Savannah (Ga.) News, is an account of the larceny of the yacht Wanderer from the harbor of that
city:

The following is the history of the transaction: On Tuesday, persons on
the lower bay observed that the Wanderer was taking stores on board,
and on the same afternoon sailed
west. On Tuesday evening,
Lamar, her owner, who had been ab-
sent and but just returned to the city,
met Collector Boston, and stated to
him that he had reason to suspect
that Capt. Martin, who had been negotiating with him for an interest in
the Wanderer, and who it seems,
had assumed the command of her,
intended to steal the vessel, and requested that the Collector instruct
officers of the Cutter to keep close watch on her. Boston informed Lamar that the Cutter had gone to sea,
and that he had no means of preventing the vessel from being stolen, leaving him to employ such means as the civil authorities of the port would afford him.

On Wednesday morning the Wan-
derer having disappeared during the
night, Mr. Lamar called on Mr.
Boston and notified him of the fact,
and asked him to write to the American Consul at Havana, and to others, advising them of the escape,
and Lamar subsequently returned to the Custom House and said to Boston that the Wanderer was
aground in the river, and requested
him to furnish a steamer to go in pursuit of her. Mr. Boston informed Lamar that it was a new case in his
experience, that the escape was a violation of the revenue laws, but it was his property that had been stolen—
Mr. Lamar's—that he did not feel authorized, the Cutter not being
at his command, to contract a debt on the part of the Government, to recover his vessel, at the same time
informing him that if he would pro-
cure a steamer to go in pursuit of the Wanderer, he would instruct an officer of the Revenue to accompany
them, and that he would lay the matter before the Government, and if
payment of the expenses incurred
were refused, he—Mr. Lamar—
would be responsible.

The interview between Boston and
Lamar took place about nine o'clock,
a. m., at which time the Wanderer
was seen from the Exchange steeple,
aground, not far from Tybee. Mr.
Lamar procured the steam tug Columbus, and accompanied by two custom house officers, with a number
of friends, well armed, among whom
were several who had sold ship supplies to the Wanderer, yet to be
paid for, left the city at 15 minutes
past 10 o'clock, in pursuit. From
the steeple of the Exchange the Wanderer was seen to get under way
about half-past 11 o'clock, and on
the arrival of the Columbus at Ty-
bee, at half-past 12, the yacht, having a favorable wind was entirely
out of sight. No doubt that vessel
has gone to the coast of Africa to
take in another cargo, and it looks
very much as though the whole matter was arranged with Lamar and
connived at by him.

Secretary Hartnett and the Mormon Newspapers.

The Mormon organs in this city have turned aside, for a time from the attempt at which they were recently engaged, of trying to impair the credit of the gentile merchants in this city, and valley, and are now bestowing the venom and bile which seem to rankle in their stomachs upon Hon. John Hartnett, Secretary of the Territory, who is absent on a visit to the States. Both of these journals are greatly exercised at the inadequate provision which they allege has been made for holding the present session of the Territorial Legislature; and both pitch into Mr. Hartnett with as little sense as decency, on account of the alleged incompleteness and insufficiency of the articles furnished. The spiritual organ leads off in this attack. In its issue of Dec. 7th, in an article captioned "Meeting of the Legislature," it takes occasion to predict before hand that no provision would be made for the approaching session of the Legislature; and if the members thereof met at all, they would have to furnish themselves with whatever was necessary for their meetings and deliberations. In connection with these prophesying, it launches forth in a general tirade of abuse and detraction against Mr. Hartnett, for the manner in which he has heretofore performed his duties—calls him parsimonious, and tells about that was going to give the Secretary a severe castigation, but was restrained by a friend, because no honor could redound from the deed, owing to the calibre of the Secretary. In the issue of the following week, the News resumes the cudgels before employed against the Secretary, and wields them this time in a manner much more dreadful than at first. He marches directly up to the work too, and heads his article in a proper manner—"The Territorial Secretary and Retrenchment" are the ominous words that precede the fearful blows that follow. A letter which bears unmistakable signs of being trumped up in order to furnish some pretext for resuming the assault upon the assault upon the Secretary, precedes the editorial article. The writer of the article depreciates in faint tones, the animadversions on the Secretary in the News of the previous week—has a little soft prattle about retrenchment, and concludes by saying that Gov. Cumming is making every reasonable preparation to the wants of the Legislature. The pseudo correspondent having discharged his rocket, the editor proceeds to launch his thunderbolts, and opens by saying that he did not mean to use any "severe animadversions" in his article of the previous week, but "used as mild language as was possible under the circumstances to convey, in some slight degree our contempt for such meanness." This statement imparts a double edge to the "severe animadversions" referred to, and leads every one, of course, to conclude that they were prompted by truth, and a sense of injustice done, and not by malignity or revenge.

After this consoling assurance, we hear some general talk about the appropriations for the Territories being misapplied; when the Secretary comes in for a fresh attack, and this time the language employed is not altogether as "mild" as at first. The Secretary from "constitutional disability, cannot understand the duties of his office," but nevertheless, it is intimated that he has perpetrated some great "imposition" and wrong on the people of this Territory. The "imposition" referred to, was probably the course he pursued while paying off the members of the Legislature last winter. It will be remembered that a portion of the members of the last Territorial Legislature met in this city on the 13th of December of last year without authority of any kind, those that assembled were sworn in and then adjourned to meet at Fillmore, the real Capitol of the Territory, where they assembled and organized on the 18th of December; they soon adjourned there, and again convened in this city on the 28th day of December. When Mr. Hartnett came to pay the members their per diem, several of them claimed pay from the time at which they first assembled in this city. But this demand the Secretary refused allowing, regarding their first meeting here as unauthorized by law. Some of the members who claimed their pay and were refused, became very indignant at the course of the Secretary, and a few of them we have been informed, refused receiving any pay at all, as all they claimed was not allowed. The Secretary, however, referred the whole matter to the proper authorities at Washington City, who sustained the course which he had pursued. But ever since he refused paying the illegal demand of and particularly their organs here, have seen nothing in him but incapacity and disqualification for the duties of his office.

And this is the chief burden of the article in the "News." Its cotemporary and co-laborer in the work of detraction does little more than enlarge upon the thoughts which the "News" throws out. It sends up a rather longer and more piteous howl about the benches, desks and stationery furnished the members of the Legislature than the "News" did. It deals as it always does, rather more largely in balderdash and twaddle than the spiritual organ, but really says less.

Some of the allusions and remarks which it makes are most unfortunate, and no doubt have called up in other minds besides ours, recollections in no way creditable to one of the editors of the Journal, which made them. Of this nature were some allusions to the chairs provided for the members of the Legislature. The inconsistency, malignity and falsity of these repeated assaults on Mr. Hartnett, is rendered palpable by the close of the article in the "Mountaineer" where it is said that "the Governor has been fair with the Legislature, he has assumed duties that belonged to others and has discharged those duties, according to our views, as a true Jacksonian Democrat." Now among the duties "assumed" by Gov. Cumming, and which he has performed as a "true Jacksonian Democrat," has been that of providing for the present session of the Legislature. Yet he is praised and extolled, while the absent Secretary, whose duties he has performed, is censured beyond measure. What consistency, or sense is there, in either praise or blame like this? It displays the weakness and meanness of the soul that offers it, but can in no way, harm the object at which it is directed. So also with the insinuations which the "Mountaineer" freely indulges in, as to Mr. Hartnett's official honesty. Such accusations come with a bad grace from one who has hardly yet got rid of the smell of bilge water, and yet has been in the country long enough to carry in his pocket a pardon for treason from the President of the United States. Accusations from such a source are hardly worth noticing, and we do not suppose that Mr. Hartnett will thank us for the task we have performed, but we deemed it due, and have done it. And before the Mormon organs here, enter upon any more assaults on either the public or private reputation of any man, what official or private life, we recommend them to first examine their own skirts and see what they are made of.

We comment on the consideration of a story that we have heard or read concerning Gen. Jackson, while he was President of the United States. He was once approached by a man, who, from his appearance, had fought the whisky bottle a little too long, and looked rather worse for the wearing. He was full of patriotism of course, and on leaving, patted the old hero on the back and bade him, "take good care of the Constitution." The Gen'l. who knew how to rebuke impertinence without becoming offended at it, gently turned, and advised him also, to be a little cautious about his own.

Varieties Theatre at Camp
Floyd.

We received a letter from a correspondent at Camp Floyd, during the last week, which spoke in high terms of the above-mentioned place of amusement, and we doubt not that the praise bestowed is well deserved. The theatre is under the management of Messrs. Willis & Crawford, both of whom, we believe, have acquired reputation at the Camp as successful caterers for the amusement and entertainment of the public. We hope their efforts will continue to meet with success; and we advise all our readers, when they go to Camp Floyd, not to miss the fun which they will be sure to enjoy by going to the Varieties Theatre.

Resurrection—On Sunday night the firm of Gilbert & Gorlish, of this city, had eight head of horses and mules, valued at over $1,000 taken from their stable on East Temple street.

The citizens of Lafayette county, Missouri, have, by a majority of nearly 1,000 voted to appropriate $500,000 to the construction of a railroad from Lexington, to intersect with the Pacific railroad at the most accessible and convenient point to that place.

Doctor Cheever, the well known abolition divine, of New York City, sent, not long since a female agent to beg for money for the support of himself and church. This would indicate that the teachings of fanaticism are not well repaid in New York.

The latest news from Brownsville, Texas, is that Cortinas and his band had captured the place. The report, however, lacks confirmation. Fifty government troops left New Orleans on the 14th of November, for Brownsville, on the steamer Arizona.

EDITOR VALLEY TALK:—We were handed the "Mountaineer" a few days since, and were very much surprised to see the private note, which we penned to the Editors to suspend our patronage, inserted "verbatim et letteratim" in one of their columns. The note was strictly private, which we never intended, or anticipated coming before the public gaze. But as it has made its debut, (without our knowledge or consent) ushered in with the copious comments of the Editors, we think it due to ourselves, as the humble representative of the firm of Moore & Greene, (both of them being absent) to show the true cause that elicited said note. Having lived in such close proximity to the Mountaineer office for some time past, we feel a little elated, from the fact that we have imbibed, absorbed, inhaled, or some how else, find ourselves in possession of a degree of independence, which prompted us to brave the Mountaineers, and withdraw our trivial support, and find sufficient stock on hand, to vindicate our course for so doing.

Although, it has deprived them of the "patronage of great men" (which is more desirable than others as a matter of course) yet we will endeavor to show that it was not the vindication of our "home boys" that produced the disastrous results, which "caused" them the loss of future patronage. We would be very sorry indeed to know that the humblest citizen in our midst, would be "betrayed" from the path of rectitude, or permit his moral predilections to be swayed from their proper channel through the paltry influence of a newspaper subscription; much less our friends of the Mountaineer. We admire their candor, their freedom of thought, and extended range of the pen; but when we consider they are infringing upon, or invading the rights reserved to ourselves, we think there is no criminality in using that "constitutional" prerogative of pulling on the strings.

Just here, there are other merchants here who have designed to brook their displeasure, who either preceded us or followed in our wake, in the same category with ourselves, yet their names are ignored, and ours only, enjoy the distinguished honor, of being noticed by the "Mountaineer." We would, under the circumstances, consider we had proved recreant to the trust reposed in us, were we to crouch, spaniel-like, at the shrine, and commend, by our support and silence, the propagation of such derogatory statements, as are emblazoned forth through their columns, applicable to all the merchants of this city, save those shielded by the cognomen of "home merchants." The sweeping interrogatory is propounded: "Who among our foreign merchants has spent a dime towards adorning our city?"

As far as donations are concerned, we have yet to learn there has ever been any very munificent ones made by home or foreign merchants, to adorn and embellish Salt Lake City, but our friends well know that the aggregate annual amount assessed and collected for Territorial, County and City taxes, and for house rent, in this city from "foreign merchants" is immense.

"They have (foreign merchants) endeavored to make our city a campground, and our Territory a bloody battle-field. They are doing so still." Here it is in living characters, stands forth in bold relief, in the strongest terms their plethoric pen could concoct. And, lest false impressions "should go abroad," we here state, this is the spring that incited us to action, and not the benevolent suggestion deemed it our duty to pursue the course we did from the fact, that we were the means of bringing the Mountaineer to our house, hence it devolved upon us to banish it from our threshold. Any man knowing himself innocent, and will write under this castigation, and lend strength to the arm that inflicts the blows, is perfectly at liberty to do so.

The men who compose this firm need no comment from my pen. Their antecedents are too well known, and are only mentioned here, to let the people know they are not the men to engage in a crusade against them; and the arrows so adroitly aimed at them by our Mountaineers, fall harmlessly at their feet. In relation to "home merchants," we state, with them we are upon the most felicitous terms, and it is to them and to the citizens of Utah that we appeal from the decision of our adjudicators, whether we have ever manifested a martial spirit, either in word, act or deed. And, in conclusion, would say, come around to Moore & Greene's "cheap store," and we will cultivate a better acquaintance.

Brownsville Stormed and Taken by Cortinas.

Americans driven across the river.—No quarter.—Prisoners massacred.—The steamer Charles Morgan, from Indianapolis, arrived late last night, bringing the latest news from Brownsville, which place has been stormed and captured by Cortinas, as appears by the following affidavit of one of its escaped citizens, a copy of which has come to this office:

CORPUS CHRISTI, Nov. 7, 1859.—On the 24th of October, Cortinas and his band surrounded the town of Brownsville. On the 31st, Cortinas ordered the barricade to be changed; at the same time his men made good entrance from the yards at the back of the stores and dwelling houses; in a moment his men and ours were mixed up in a hand to hand fight, and a moment more the barricades were forced. After five hours hand to hand fighting, we were forced to retreat, and succeeded in making our escape to the other side of the river.

Cortinas's attacking party consisted of about four hundred men, and had in all probability two hundred men patrolling the country to prevent communication with the city. In all told we had about fifty white men under arms, and these were aided by one hundred and fifty Mexicans, sent from Matamoros, Col. Manuel (Naranjo) commander of the force.

I can form no idea of the number of men killed on either side. The cry of the Mexicans was, "death to all Americans! No quarter!" And such was truly the case, as it proved, by the death of every man Cortinas has taken prisoner. On Tuesday, Cortinas had entire possession of Brownsville.

It was reported that the two bands of Cortinas numbered seven hundred men.

THE LATEST NEWS.

NEW ORLEANS, Nov. 14.

The Steamship Charles Morgan, from Galveston the 11th inst., brings the affidavit of Wm. Miller, who fled from Brownsville, dated Corpus Christi, Nov. 7th, which states, circumstantially, that Cortinas' band captured Brownsville on the 31st ult. after five hours of hard fighting, and was in full possession of the town on the 1st of November. J. Marks & Co., wholesale dry goods merchants of this city, however, have letters direct from their house at Brownsville, dated Nov. 2, 5 p. m., stating no reinforcements have yet arrived, but that Cortinas, however, had made no demonstration against them. They were hourly expecting the rangers and Government troops. Mr. Marks and others here say that Miller is entitled to no credit, and think the rangers and troops will reach Brownsville in season to repel an attack. Mr. Marks' letters cause disbelief in the previous Christi accounts of the 13th.

The rebellion at Victoria, Mexico, had been quelled and the leaders had been shot. The troops sent to quell it had marched. Degollado's headquarters were still in San Luis.

Five fires have occurred here since Saturday, three of which, however, were of trifling extent. The other two were the new basin row, consisting of six stores in Rampart st., loss $70,000; and nine squares, embracing eighty small buildings above Chippewa street, in the fourth district; loss $100,000. One hundred families were rendered homeless by the latter fires, which was the work of an incendiary.

A heavy gale is now raging along the coast. The weather is very cold, and ice has made its appearance.

The steamship Robert Waterman had been abandoned and is a total loss. Her cargo is being plundered by fishermen.

Snow fell in some parts of Mississippi on Sunday.

There were three deaths from yellow fever in this city last week.

Gov. Ransom, Receiver of Public Moneys at Fort Scott, Kansas Territory, died on Friday last of typhoid fever.

Mr. Ward in China.

SHANGHAI, Aug. 22.—The United States steam frigate Powhatan, having on board John E. Ward the United States Minister, has just arrived from the Peiho. From her officers we learn the following items of news:

On the 15th ult., while the Powhatan was anchored off Peitang, there arrived an Imperial Edict, ordering that the American Minister and suite of twenty should be escorted with all honor to Pekin, and that they should leave Peitang any day after the 19th.

The edict was in answer to a communication of the American Minister, informing the authorities that he was present and ready to exchange the treaty at any time and place which they might appoint. On the morning of the 20th, Mr. Ward and suite arrived at Peitang, where they were received by an escort and conducted to Pekin with every show of respect.

They first traveled forty-five miles across the country in covered cars, striking the Opeho some ten miles above Tien-Tsing, and thence proceeded in junks to Toong Chan, distant twelve miles from Pekin, of which it is the port. Here they again took carts for the capital. The entire trip took eight days and a half, five of which were passed upon the river. They passed not less than six or eight barriers between Pei-ting and Toong-chan now, none of them; however, being in repair, or backed by forts. The boatmen said they were partly to stop the English, and partly to afford shelter to junks when the ice was breaking up.

The Legation remained at Pekin fifteen days, during which they were confined to their quarters; not, however, as prisoners, for they were at liberty at any moment to walk out, but the Commissioners refused the use of horses and guides, leaving it optional with Mr. Ward to grant permission to walk out or not, as he saw fit. They would, doubtless, however, have closed the gates entirely had not that gentleman taken a firm stand at the very first interview, informing Kwei L'eng that as soon as his movements should be at all restricted, he should close all intercourse, and demand a return escort. It seems that the Emperor was very anxious to see Mr. Ward, but that he also persisted upon his Ko tow—i. e., prostrating himself nine times with his head to the ground, which was positively refused, as being against the principles of his Excellency. The result of this was, that upon the fourteenth day of their stay it was concluded to receive the President's letter at Peitang, and to send his Excellency back next day they returned accordingly.

They arrived at Peitang on the 16th; and treaties were then exchanged, and the English prisoner named John Powell given up. This man was a seaman on board the Highflyer, and who with a sapper, had been captured on the 25th June, fearing for his life, had proclaimed himself an American. The Chinese informant, Mr. Ward, was then escorted to the capital, and the English prisoner named John Powell given up. This man was a seaman on board the Highflyer, and who with a sapper, had been captured on the 25th June, fearing for his life, had proclaimed himself an American. The Chinese inform-organs in this city have for a time from the attack they were recently engaged to impair the credit of merchants in this city and now bestowing the venal upon Hon. John Hartnett, the Territory, who is about to the States. Both of are greatly exercised at provision which they aimed for holding the pre-Territorial Legislature into Mr. Hartnett's sense as decency, on alleged incompleteness and the articles furnished. organ leads off in this attack of Dec. 7th, in an article "Meeting of the Legislature" to predict before revision would be made for session of the Legislature members thereof met at and have to furnish them whatever was necessary for and deliberations. In these prophesying, it in a general tirade of action against Mr. Hartnett in which he has formed his duties—callous, and tells about a lady to give the Secretary a lion, but was restrained by no honor could redound owing to the calibre of the issue of the following resumes the charges against the Secretary, and in time in a manner much than at first. He marches the work too, and heads a proper manner—"The Secretary and Retrenchment" words that precede the that follow. A letter unmistakable signs of being order to furnish some preliminary the assault upon the Secretary, precedes the file. The writer of the article Secretary in the News of week—has a little soft pratelment, and concludes by Gov. Cumming is making preparation to supply the Legislature. The present having discharged his editor proceeds to launch his, and opens by saying "I mean to use any 'severe' in his article of the present" "used as mild language" under the circumstances some slight degree of course, and leads to a double edge to the "severe" referred to, and leads to course, to conclude that tempted by truth, and a sense one, and not by malignity

the members, the Mormon authorities, and particularly their organs here, have seen nothing in him but incapacity and disqualification for the duties of his office.

And this is the chief burden of the article in the "News." Its cotemporary and co-laborer in the work of detraction does little more than enlarge upon the thoughts which the "News" throws out. It sends up a rather longer and more piteous howl about the benches, desks and stationery furnished the members of the Legislature than the "News" did. It deals as it always does, rather more largely in balderdash and twaddle than the spiritual organ, but really says less.

Some of the allusions and remarks which it makes are most unfortunate, and no doubt have called up in other minds besides ours, recollections in no way creditable to one of the editors of the Journal, which made them. Of this nature were some allusions to the chairs provided for the members of the Legislature. The inconsistency, malignity and falsity of these repeated assaults on Mr. Hartnett, is rendered palpable by the close of the article in the "Mountaineer" where it is said that "the Governor has been fair with the Legislature, he has assumed duties that belonged to others and has discharged those duties, according to our views, as a true Jacksonian Democrat." Now among the duties "assumed" by Gov. Cumming, and which he has performed as a "true Jacksonian Democrat," has been that of providing for the present session of the Legislature. Yet he is praised and extolled, while the absent Secretary whose duties he has performed, is censured beyond measure. What consistency, or sense, is there, in either praise or blame like this? It displays the weakness and meanness of the soul that offers it, but can in no way, harm the object at which it is directed. So also with the insinuations which the "Mountaineer" freely indulges in, as to Mr. Hartnett's official honesty. Such accusations come with a bad grace from one who has hardly yet got rid of the smell of bilge water, and yet has been in the country long enough to carry in his pocket a pardon for treason from the President of the United States. Accusations from such a source are hardly worth noticing, and we do not suppose that Mr. Hartnett will thank us for the task we have performed, but we deemed it due, and have done it. And before the Mormon organs utter the public or private reputation of any man, what a in official or private life, we recommend them to first examine their own skirts and see whether they are free from blemish.

We commend and relate for their consideration a story that we have heard or read concerning Gen. Jackson, while he was President of the United States. He was once approached by a man, who, from his appearance, had fought the whiskey bottle a little too long, and looked rather worse than the engagement; he was full of patriotism of course, and on leaving, patted the old hero on the back and bade him "take good care of the Constitution." The Genl. who knew how to rebuke impudence without becoming offended at it, gently turned and advised him also, to be a little cautious about his own.

Poll first the beam out of thine own eye, then shalt thou see clearly how to pluck the mote out of thy brother's eye, saith the Scripture.

Another ball was held at the Townsend House last Thursday evening. Like the former one, it passed off delightfully to all that were in attendance. In some respects it was an improvement on the first ball—a live bishop, for instance, graced the second gathering with his august presence and lent cadet to the occasion. There was, besides, a candy shop in the hall, which we think drove an excellent business, and divided with the dance the attention and patronage of the members of the party. Another ball, which we are informed is to be the grandest of the season, will be held at the place of the two former ones next Thursday evening.

Varieties Theatre at Camp Floyd.

We received a letter from a correspondent at Camp Floyd, during the last week, which spoke in high terms of the above-mentioned place of amusement, and we doubt not that the praise bestowed is well deserved. The theatre is under the management of Messrs. Willis & Crawford, both of whom, we believe, have acquired reputation at the Camp as successful caterers for the amusement and entertainment of the public. We hope their efforts will continue to meet with success; and we advise all our readers, when they go to Camp Floyd, not to miss the fun which they will be sure to enjoy by going to the Varieties Theatre.

I have had no revelation in regard to the stealing that is going on in this Territory. When the Lord wants it stopped, He will stop it. I believe that a man can steal and be justified in the act. Extract of a sermon preached by Brigham Young, on Sunday, Dec. 13th.

Result.—On Sunday night the firm of Gilbert & Gerrish, of this city, had eight head of horses and mules, valued at over $1,000 taken from their stable on East Temple street.

The citizens of Lafayette county, Missouri, have, by a majority of nearly 1,000, voted to appropriate $300,000 to the construction of a railroad from Lexington, to intersect with the Pacific railroad at the most accessible and convenient point to that place.

Doctor Cheever, the well known abolition divine, of New York City, sent, not long since a female agent to beg for money for the support of himself and church. This would indicate that the teachings of fanaticism are not well repaid in New York.

The latest news from Brownsville, Texas, is that Cortinas and his band had captured the place. The report, however, lacks confirmation. Fifty government troops left New Orleans on the 14th of November, for Brownsville, on the steamer Arizona.

Brownsville Stormed and Taken by Cortinas.

Americans driven across the river.—No quarter.—Prisoners massacred.

A portion of the band of Cortinas had attacked the city of Rio Grande, pillaging nearly every house.

It was reported that the two bands of Cortinas numbered seven hundred men.

The people of Brownsville were in the greatest distress. All the mails were interrupted by the outlaws, and Cortinas had threatened to destroy the town and cut off and murder all the reinforcements that might be sent on to the relief of the terror stricken citizens.

NEW ORLEANS, Nov. 14.

The Steamship Charles Morgan, from Galveston the 11th inst., brings the affidavit of Wm. Miller, who fled from Brownsville, dated Corpus Christi, Nov. 7th, which states; circumstantially, that Cortinas, had captured Brownsville on the 31st ult., after five hours of hard fighting, and was in full possession of the town on the 1st of November. SHANGHAI, Aug. 22.—The United States steam frigate Powhatan, having on board John E. Ward, United States Minister, has just arrived from the Peiho. From here, officers we learn the following news:

On the 16th ult., while the Powhatan was anchored off Peitang, she arrived an Imperial Edict, ordering that the American Minister and suite of twenty should be escorted with honor to Peking, and that they should leave Peitang any day after the 19th.

The edict was in answer to a communication of the American Minister, informing the authorities that he was present and ready to exchange the treaty at any time and place which they might appoint. On the morning of the 20th, Mr. Ward and suite arrived at Peitang, where they were received by an escort and conducted to Peking with every show of respect. They fitted traveled five miles across the country in covered carts, striking the Opheio some ten miles above Tien-Tsing, thence proceeded in junks to Tsoog, and Chan, distant twelve miles from Peking, of which it is the port. Here they again took carts for the capital.

The entire trip took eight days, and a half, five of which were passed upon the river. Anxious to serve the poor fellow, he intimated that it would be a great personal favor if they would turn him over, and as such it was done. He is now on board of the Powhatan. SAFETY OF THE NORTH STAR.—The public anxiety, which has prevailed for some days in regard to the safety of the Vanderbilt steamship North Star, long overdue, with nearly 900 souls on board, was relieved on Thursday morning by the following dispatch from Charleston: CHARLESTON, Nov. 14, 1859.

A letter to The Charleston Courier, dated Nassau, N. P., Nov. 9th, states that the steamer North Star, from New York for Aspinwall, got ashore about the 25th of October on French Keys, and remained on the Keys six or seven days, but finally got off without extra assistance, by throwing over some coal and with the loss of anchors, and proceeded on her voyage on the 2nd inst.

Seward and Giddings and Greeley and Hale and other Black Republicans are begging for mercy because they did not shed the blood at Harper's Ferry, and would make the people believe that they did not incite it. They are exactly in the same bad fix as the trumpeter in the fable. A trumpeter, says Aesop, being taken prisoner in a battle, begged hard for quarter. "Spare me, good sirs, I beseech you," said he; "put me not to death without cause, for I have killed no one, nor have I arms, save only 'is poor trumpet.'" "For that very reason," said his captors, "shall you the sooner die, for without the spirit to fight, yourself, you stir up others to bloodshed."

Commodore Vanderbilt, of New York, has sued Henry J. Raymond, editor of the New York Times, for libel, in charging him with co-operating with Gen. Charter.

By the City of Baltimore, we received brief accounts of the wreck of the screw steamship Royal Charter, and the fearful loss of life involved therein. We are now in possession of graphic and copious details of the sad calamity.

It appears that the Royal Charter when within two or three hours sail of Liverpool (after a rapid passage from Melbourne,) experienced the full fury of a terrible north-east gale, which prevailed all over England, during the night of the 25th and 26th ult.

The steam power of the vessel being merely auxiliary, it was insufficient to prevent her from being driven towards the shore, and as the water was rapidly shoaling, it became necessary, at about ten o'clock at night, to let go the anchors, guns having been previously fired and rockets discharged in the hope of attracting a pilot, but without success.

The gale meantime increased to a perfect hurricane, and at two o'clock in the morning, the port anchor chain parted, and shortly afterwards the ship was beating on the rocks in a place called Moeffa Bay, near Puffin Island, on the coast of Anglesea. The masts were cut away, but without any beneficial results.

About daylight (six o'clock) a sailor with a cord tied around his waist, jumped overboard, and although the sea ran tremendously high, he succeeded in reaching and maintaining a footing on the rocky shore, which was not more than ten yards distant from the ship, but was almost perpendicular to the height of forty feet. A hawser was then got ashore and a boatswain chair was attached to it with a view of hauling the passengers and crew on shore. About a dozen seamen were by this means soon landed, and it was hoped that all on board might be saved.

At about seven o'clock, however, the waves beating against the ship's broadside with continued violence, she suddenly snapped asunder amidst ships and tumbled in pieces. As the passengers had mostly kept below, large numbers were killed by the crashing debris, and only twenty-six managed to get ashore, making the whole number of saved only thirty-nine out of a total (passengers and crew) of 493.

The scene was terrible in the extreme. Many were washed on and off the rocks several times, and in numerous instances those who thought themselves secure on the jutting rocks, were hurled back into the sea by the furious waves.

Not a superior officer was saved, neither a woman nor a child.

Captain Taylor exerted himself to the utmost, but was finally struck on the head while struggling in the water, by a boat falling from the davits, and was seen no more.

The destruction of the ship was rapid and complete, so that by eight o'clock nothing was visible but masses of wreck, mingled with bodies of the dead washed on the strand. The prostration of the telegraph wires, and the destruction by the sea of a portion of the Chester and Holyhead Railroad—which passes the locality—caused considerable delay in the reception of the news at Liverpool, and a consequent loss of time in sending tug-boats to the spot.

The vessel had on board (supposed) 79,000 ounces of gold, besides a large number of sovereigns, estimated of the total value of £500,000 to £800,000, and hopes were entertained that this might be recovered by divers.

The Royal Charter was an iron vessel of 2,749 tons register, clipper built, and furnished with auxiliary screw engines. She was built in 1855, at a cost of over £90,000, and was insured for £30,000. Her general cargo was not very valuable—say £5,000.

Of the persons on board the Royal Charter when she left Australia, sixty-three were cabin passengers, 325 other passengers and 133 crew—total, 511. Of these seventeen passengers were landed at Queens-town and thirty-nine were saved from the wreck, so that the total loss of life was 455. Among these reckoned as the crew were eleven riggers who were transferred from a tug boat to the Royal Charter in the channel for conveyance to Liverpool.

Insurances were being effected at Lloyds on the hullion at twenty-five per cent. premium.

Mauritius.

In a work which has just made its appearance in Philadelphia, under the title of "Four Years Aboard the Whaleship," there are some curious revelations concerning the slave traffic under British rule in the Mauritius. The author, Mr. Whitecar, though a common sailor, appears from the internal evidence of his book to be a trustworthy and intelligent observer, and until his statement receive an authoritative contradiction, we see no reason for questioning their correctness.

In describing the motley population of the island, Mr. Whitecar accounts for the presence of the Malabar and Madagasgar natives in such large numbers by the fact that they are purchased from the native chiefs by English or French traders in exchange for old muskets, kegs of powder, jack knives, hoop iron, trinkets, beads, calico, and such other articles as are held in esteem amongst the savages. They are sold ostensibly for a term of years, but in reality for as long as their owners choose to detain them. The governor of Mauritius, receiving so much per head as a perquisite for each one that is imported into the colony, holds out every inducement for their introduction into the island, and from the crowded state of the ships that arrived during Mr. Whitecar's stay, he was led to conclude that the trade must be a thriving one. As soon as the slaves reach the colony they are disposed of to the highest bidder, and our author was justly surprised to see two English auctioneers mounted on their rostrums, engaged in selling them as they would any other merchandise. The poor creatures, he says, were gathered and arranged in groups, and neither sex had any other covering than the breech cloth, in order that their muscular system might be displayed to the best advantage. The purchasers, who were for the most part French planters, walked in amongst them, examined their muscles, teeth and joints, made them leap to show their activity, and in every way that their experience suggested, satisfied themselves in regard to their availability. The only saving clause in the whole transaction was that, in case any of the slaves had a family, the purchaser was compelled to buy them all together or not at all.

Of the treatment of these unfortunate on the plantations, Mr. Whitecar gives anything but a favorable account. The overseers apply the whip without remorse, and there is this worse feature than the punishment by lashes on the back in vogue in our Southern States, that the blows are generally bestowed on the skull. The gross brutality to which the poor wretches are in general subjected may be judged of from the fact that he saw a policeman calmly looking on while a slave was knocked down and dragged by the waistband over the sharp points of the macadamised street, with nothing to preserve his body from laceration, except the calico that was wound round his loins. This scene occurred, not in an obscure or out of the way place, but in a public street, where people were constantly passing, and who, if any feeling at all were expressed by them, only laughed at the ludicrousness of the scene.

Here then, we have in a British colony, under British laws and under a British government, a slave traffic not only of internal exchange and of great practical cruelty, but a traffic that is constantly being fed by importation. And whilst in our Southern States there is the justification of a pre-existent and present necessity, which can only be dispensed with by time; and to the extension of which the laws offer an effectual barrier, in the Mauritius, where no plea of expediency can be urged in opposition to positive enactment, the fullest latitude is accorded to it. These facts will not surprise those who know anything about John Bull's career in tropical countries, where his true nature can display itself unchecked by Exeter Hall fanaticism. The objection that we make is less to his owning slaves himself, than to his affecting such a virtuous horror of the same practice in others.—N. Y. Herald.

Day Deceiver in Dayton.

He Gains the Affections of Five Ladies in that City, and Two Elsewhere.

[From the Journal of Saturday.]

We heard yesterday some particulars in regard to the proceedings of a certain Joseph Hemphill, which we were requested to publish, as well for the purpose of exposing the villainous conduct of the man, as to put unsuspecting women on their guard. Hemphill, under compulsion and to avoid imprisonment, married in Dayton on the 3d of September last, a widow whom he had deceived and ruined, and immediately after the ceremony, took her to the Lafayette House, where he left her and did not return, and she has never seen him since.

At the same time that this affair of his was in progress, he had made arrangements to marry another widow, whom he had persuaded to meet him at Springfield, the very day after he was married in Dayton, under the circumstances above named. The friends of his second fiancée, however, discerned the purpose of Hemphill, and prevented the consummation of the wrong intended.

But this is not all. While Hemphill had these two matrimonial engagements on his hands, he was courting a third widow living in Dayton, and finally gained her consent to marry him. He persuaded her to let him have about $60, in money which she had saved, on the pretence of making preparations for the nuptials, and assuring her that he had just bought a farm near Dayton; he ran off with her money after he was married to the woman first named.

This, we believe, is all that is known of his dealings with the widows—but it is well understood that two young women living in Dayton and vicinity were the objects of his attentions, and the recipients of his promise to marry. Here are no less than five women who were at one time in the toils of this villain, and all living within the circuit of a few miles.

Since his departure, letters have been received detailing the deceptions made in other places. One instance is given of his engagement to a lady, who made all preparations for the marriage, the day fixed, the company assembled, but the expected bridegroom turned up missing. Another instance is authenticated by letter of his engagement to another woman living some distance from here—making in all seven, who have suffered from his machinations. How many more might be added to the list, if they would all speak, but we of course are unable to say.

Hemphill is about forty years of age, near six feet high, heavy set and dark complexion. He had been living in of Harshmansville for about two years. When last heard from he was at Bellefontaine. He is entitled to a first rate notice in the papers.

RUMORS OF A FAILURE OF THE GREAT EASTERN.—The London correspondent of the N. Y. Herald writes:

I passed yesterday evening in the company of two of the most celebrated inventors and scientific men in England. I have heard much to modify the last opinion that I ventured to pronounce on the mechanical merits of the Great Eastern. I am assured that there has been some hocus pocus practiced upon the doves of the press who returned to the ark on the occasion of the second trial trip. There has been, as you are aware, no measured mile run, no Stoke's Bay trial. It is easy to impose upon any one, or any one may impose upon himself, when the log is hove to ascertain the speed of the vessel. I am told now that thirteen knots is the outside that has been made, with the aid of canvass, and that they can get no more. This must be admitted to be a failure, if it be the case, and I see no reason to doubt it. My informant laughed at the idea of the Great Eastern ever paying or running to Australia, or between England and America more than once. More than this have I heard, some of which looks ugly: as, for instance, that a holder of shares, and also an officer of the vessel, was influenced by direct means not to sell his stock, which he would otherwise have done. Do not be surprised at anything you may hear. I never expected the ship to be a commercial success, and still less so in the hands of her present directorate; but I own that I was astonished as well as disappointed, to hear such statements as I did last night, from such sources respecting her mechanical success.

Dust From California.

Under the head of "A Modern Cinderella," the San Francisco Bulletin tells the following story. "In one of those filthy alleys which lead out of Jackson street, there lived a beautiful damsel named Ah Choong, who, of all her lovers, preferred Cha See; and he, of all the damsels in the city, preferred Ah Choong. Now, as acid loves acid, and sweet loves sweet, it was natural that the lovers should come together, and so they did; but a wicked old hag, who had a mortgage of $200 on the girl, envied their happiness and tore them asunder. From that time Ah Choong was put in a narrow room, not much bigger than a coffin, and every day the old witch belabored her with a broom stick, thinking in that way to drive out of her head the remembrance of the youth; but love was too strong, and although the beauty of the damsel was much defaced, it was impossible to destroy the daguerreotype of Cha See which the sun of affection had imprinted in her heart. Now, while the damsel was suffering all the horrors of purgatory for the sake of love, Cha See suffered no less, as he wandered about the city thinking how he might circumvent the witch and carry off the damsel. It is said that love is omniscient and all powerful—and so it seems—for it managed to let Ah Choong know that a carriage was in waiting at the corner of the street, and that her lover waited there to receive her in his arms. It was night, but love has the eyes of a cat; the lass was imprisoned, but love knows no locks; it was a dangerous experiment, but love laughs at peril; and so, in spite of night, locks and danger, the damsel broke out out of her prison and ran down the ally like another Atlanta. But she ran so fast that she lost a slipper, and we suppose the devil must have been in that slipper, for Cha See would have gone back for the little jewel, and the damsel would have been caught again and put back in her prison; but as love brooks no delay, Ah Choong took off the other slipper, and flinging it at the coachman, cried out that he should drive on, and he did drive on as if his horses were made of springs and whalebone. There was great commotion on Jackson street—all the Chinamen in the Chinese quarter seemed to be up in arms, and a long string of them followed the coach which carried off the lovers. But it was no use. They had reached the Justice's office—they were wedded—and though the bride was barefoot, this is no reason why she should not live happily all the rest of her lives."

INCONVENIENCES OF CARRYING TROPHIES OF THE INVASION.—The London Virginian tells a story of a hazardous citizen of that place incurred by having on his person some of the "trophies."

"One of our townsmen, Mr. George W. Dillard, was involved in great danger at Harper's Ferry last week. He had gone there on business on the day after the capture of Old Brown and his party, and in walking along in the vicinity of the Ferry, enjoying the splendid scenery, with one of the pikes in hand and two or three blank commissions in his pocket taken from his insurgents, and which Governor Wise had given him the day before, he was pursued and captured by a party who were hunting for Cook. Mr. Dillard was immediately charged with being one of Cook's men; the pike was satisfactory evidence; and the cry was raised to 'shoot him, shoot him,' and several loaded guns were pointed at his breast. Fortunately Mr. Dillard retained his self-possession so well that the party at last yielded to his request that he should be taken to the Superintendent at the Ferry and there be permitted to prove his innocence. Mr. Dillard said it was about the most trying half hour or more he ever spent."

THRILLING INCIDENT ON THE PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD.—Herold Act.—The Hollidaysburg Standard relates the following thrilling incident that occurred on the Pennsylvania Railroad on the 4th inst.:

As one of the freight trains coming East rounded a sharp curve, near Barree Siding, the engineer saw a small child sitting in the middle of the track, playing, unconscious of its danger. He instantly whistled down brakes, and reversed his engine, but the weight of the train, and the high speed at which it was running, rendered it impossible to stop before reaching the child, which must inevitably have been crushed to death. In this emergency, when most men would have stood paralyzed with horror, the conductor of the train, Daniel McCoy, with steadiness of nerve that has few parallels, ran to the front of the engine, crawled down on the cow-catcher, and holding himself with one hand, leaned as far forward as possible, and as he approached the child, with a sweeping blow of the other throw it off the track. It was the work of an instant, and required a steady hand and a cool head to accomplish it, but he was equal to the emergency. The train was immediately stopped, and on going back the child was found lying at the foot of a small embankment, some twenty or thirty feet from the track of the road, alive and kicking, but somewhat stunned and bruised. The child belonged to a farmer named Neff, residing immediately along the road. As may well be supposed, the parents were profused in their expressions of gratitude to the noble-hearted conductor, but for whom their child would have been carried to its home a shapeless mass of flesh and bones.

It is said that when the massive walls of the citadel at Quebec were in process of erection, so great was the draft on the treasury of France that the Queen asked if they were building it of gold! This famous fortress stands 400 feet above the river, and has been appropriately called the "Gibraltar of America." It includes about forty acres on the summit of Cape Diamond. This mountain is composed chiefly of bark slate rock, with veins of quartz crystals, sparkling like diamonds; hence the name. In its deep vaults are deposited fifty-seven thousand tons of powder. Four Martello towers, 40 feet in height, stand upon plains about half a mile in advance of the first fortifications. This old walled city has a dark, dingy, and forbidding appearance, and one feels on entering its low and massive gates as if he was going into prison.

A student of the University of Virginia, writing from that institution, states that the marble slab that formerly marked the resting place of Jefferson, has entirely disappeared. The visitors to his tomb, by chipping off fragments, to be carried away as mementoes, have completely demolished it, and an uncouth granite pedestal, greatly disfigured, is all that remains to mark the grave of the author of the Declaration of Independence.

My First Love.

A MAIDEN once I chanced to know,
With beauty superb and low,
Her voice was gentle, soft and low,
That "excellent thing in woman."
We traced together mountain streams,
And when the stars were shining,
We talked of poetry and dreams—
Their mysteries divining.
I felt that fate no grief could give
Like passion unrequited,
And that I could no longer live
Unless we were united.
I breathed my love—her hand I pressed—
While she, her eyes averted, Returned the pressure, and confessed
That she was only flirting.

Divorced by a Mistake.

One winter there came to Trenton, New Jersey; two men named Smith and Jones, who had both of them designs on the Legislature. Jones had a bad wife, and was in love with a pretty woman—he wished to be divorced from his bad wife, so that he might marry the pretty woman, who was a widow, with black eyes, and such a form! Therefore Jones came to Trenton for a divorce.

Smith had a good wife, good as an angel and the mother of ten children, and Smith did not want to be divorced, but did want to get a charter for a turnpike or plank road, to extend from Pigs Run to Terrapin Hollow. Well, they with these different errands came to Trenton, and addressed the assembled wisdom with the usual arguments. First, suppers mainly composed of oysters, with a rich back ground of venison; second, liquors in great quantity, from "Jersey lightning," which is a kind of locomotive at full speed, reduced to liquid shape, to Newark champagne.

To speak in plain prose, the divorce man gave a champagne supper, and Smith, the turnpike man, followed with a champagne breakfast, under the modifying influence of which the assembled wisdom passed both the divorce and turnpike bills; and Jones and Smith—a copy of each bill in their pockets—went rejoicing home, over miles of sand, and through the tribulation of many stage coaches.

Smith arrived home in the evening, and as he sat down in his parlor, his pretty wife beside him—how pretty she did look!—and five of her children overhearing the other five studying their lessons in the corner of the room, Smith was induced to expatiate upon the good results of his mission to Trenton.

"Turnpike, my dear; I am one of the directors, and will be president. It will set me up, love; we can send our children to the boarding school, and live in style out of the toll.—Here is the charter, honey."

"Let me see it again," said the pretty little wife, who was one of the nicest of wives, with plumpness and goodness, dimpling all over her face, "let me see it," as she leaned over Smith's shoulder.

But all at once Smith's visage grew black, Smith's wife's visage grew black. Smith was not profane, but now he ripped out an oath.

"Blast us, wife, these infernal scoundrels at Trenton have gone and divorced us."

It was too true; the parchment which he held was a bill of divorce, in which the names of Smith and Smith's wife appeared in frightful legible letters.

Mrs. Smith wiped her eyes with the corner of her apron.

"Here's a turnpike," she said sadly, "and with the whole of our ten children staring me in the face, I ain't your wife! Here's a turnpike."

"Blast the turnpike and the Legislature, and—"

Well, the fact is, that Smith, reduced to single blessedness, enacted into a stranger to his own wife, swore awfully. Although the night was dark, and most of the denizens of Smith's town had gone to bed, Smith bid his late wife to put on her bonnet, and arm in arm they proceeded to the clergyman of their church.

"Goodness bless me!" exclaimed the good man as he saw them enter. Smith looking like the last June shad; Smith's wife wiping her eyes with the corner of her apron. "Goodness bless me, what's the matter?"

The matter is, I want you to marry us two right off," replied Smith. "Marry you!" ejaculated the clergyman, with expanded fingers and awful eyes, "are you drunk; or what is the matter with you?"

However he finally married them over straightway, and would not take a fee; the fact is, grave as he was, he was dying to be alone, that he might give vent to a suppressed laugh that was shaking him all over; and Smith and Smith's wife went joyfully home and kissed every one of the children. The little Smiths never knew that their father and mother had ever been strangers by legislative enactment.

Meanwhile, and on the same night, Jones returned to his native town—Burlington, I believe—and sought at once the fine black eyes which he had hoped shortly to call his own.—The pretty widow sat on the sofa, a white kerchief tied carelessly about her round white throat, her black hair laid in silky waves against each rosy cheek.

"Divorce is the word," cried Jones, playfully patting her double chin; "the fact is, Eliza, I'm rid of that cursed woman, and you and I'll be married to-night. I know how to manage these scoundrels at Trenton. A champagne supper—or was it a breakfast?—did the business for them. Put on your bonnet and let us go to the preacher's at once dearest."

The widow, who was among widows as peaches among apples; put on her bonnet and took Jones' arm, and—

"Just look how handsome it is put on parchment!" cried Jones, pulling out the document before her; her's the law that Jacob Jones and Ann Caroline Jones are two."

Putting her plump, gloved hand on his shoulder, she did look at it.

"O dear!" she said with her rosy lips, and sank back, half fainting on the sofa.

"O blazes!" cried Jones, and sank beside her, rustling the fatal parchment in his hand, "here's a lot of happiness and champagne gone to ruin."

It was a hard case. Instead of being divorced and at liberty to marry the widow, Jacob Jones was simply, by the legislature of New Jersey, incorporated into a turnpike company, and what made it worse, authorized to run from Burlington to Bristol! When you reflect that Burlington is located just one mile from Bristol and on the opposite side of the Delaware river, you will observe the extreme hopelessness of Jones' case.

"It's all the fault of that turnpike man who gave them the champagne supper—or was it the breakfast?" cried Jones, in agony. "If they'd chartered me a turnpike from Pigs Run to Terrapin Hollow, I might have borne it; but the very idea of building a turnpike from Burlington to Bristol bears an absurdity on the face of it."

So it did.

"And you ain't divorced, said Eliza, a tear running down each cheek.

"No!" thundered Jones, crushing his hat between his knees, "and what is worse, the legislature is adjourned, and gone home drunk and won't be back till next year!"

It was a hard case.

The mistake (?) had occurred on the last day of the session, when legislators and transcribing clerks were laboring under a champagne breakfast. Smith's name had been put where Jones' ought to have been, and "wisely wearsey," as the Latin poet has it.

From the New York Herald.

What is Treason?—Who are Traitors?

Two generations have elapsed since the treason of Burr brought home to the public mind an active sentiment of what constitutes treason, and who are traitors; and living under a free government, about which every citizen is at liberty to say what he pleases, when he pleases and where he pleases, the treason at Harper's Ferry fell at first upon a blunted sense in the public mind as to what that heinous crime against the highest interests of society really is.

But the people are beginning to awaken to a sense of the true depth and bearing of the treasonable abolition conspiracy and invasion of Brown and his Northern co-traitors, and look to the administration of Mr. Buchanan to defend the principles of society, and the very foundations of government among us, by bringing every one of the parties implicated to the bar of justice. The Constitution of the United States defines this highest crime against society in these words:

"Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort."

This has been further defined by the judiciary in several decisions bearing upon the point in question, in the following clear and distinct terms:

"To constitute a levying of war there must be an assemblage of persons for the purpose of carrying into effect, by force, a treasonable purpose. [—Ex parte Ballman, 4 Cranch, 76.]

"In order to constitute the offence of treason against the United States, there should be a conspiracy to resist, generally and publicly, by force, and an actual resistance by force, or by intimidation of numbers, against a law of the United States. [United States vs. Hanway, 2 Wallace, jr., 139.]

"Where war is levied, all those who take any part in it, however minute or however remote from the scene of action, and who are actually leagued in the general conspiracy, are regarded as traitors. [—Ex parte Ballman, 4 Cranch, 75.]

Here we have the law of treason, and who are traitors, clearly defined. So accustomed have thousands of our citizens become to sit under and follow the "higher law" teachings of factious demagogues, that they have forgotten their paramount duty to their country, and the power which society must wield for the maintenance of its own existence. Seward, Chase, Wade, Wilson, Giddings, Gerrit Smith, Greeley, Howe, Sanborn, and numerous other accessories before the fact, are, equally with John Brown amenable to the law, and it is the duty of every branch of the government to defend the majesty of the law.

LOLA MONTEZ.—This somewhat celebrated woman is residing in Brooklyn, N. Y. Lola is now living with some intimate friends, who have stood by her in all her various fortunes. She is said to have really experienced a change of heart, and those that know her best, assert that recently she has lived the life of a devoted and sincere christian. Lola Montez, ever since her marriage with Lieut. Heald, in England, has claimed his name, and has always used it in business transactions. Lola neither play nor preach, for Heald enjoined in his will that his executor should pay her an annuity of $500 as long as she lived.

HORACE GREELEY'S NEW BOOK.—We see it announced that a 12mo volume, of 490 pages, will immediately be published, at New York An Overland Journal from New York to San Francisco, in the summer of 1859, by Horace Greeley.

The President authorizes the emphatic denial of the truth of the dispatch from Philadelphia, which stated that Col. Forney has received a notification from him of his intention to institute a prosecution for libel on account of the article in the Press of Monday last, in relation to the death of Senator Broderick.

Some fellows in Newcastle, Pa., started a society, which purposed to be a lodge of the Sons of Malta. One of the initiated states that after the ordeal, he signed what was represented to be the constitution of the order, but which turned out to be an order for a keg of beer upon one of the town brewers. The Club had been indulging in lager at the expense of the new member for several weeks.

"Who is he?" said a passer by to a policeman who was endeavoring to raise an intoxicated individual, who had fallen into the gutter.—"Can't say," replied the policeman, "can't give an account of himself."

"Dic (hic) does er rain (hic)?"

"In course it rains," said Dick.

The answer was apparently satisfactory, and they proceeded several rods further, when the question was again propounded by the anxious searcher after truth under difficulties.

"Dick, I say D(hic) tell me does er rain?"

"Johnny," said Dick solemnly, "I'm afraid yer drunk; in course its raining."

In a few moments Johnny was again troubled with doubts, and sought to solve them.

"Dick, seems er me (hic) ser-going (hic) er-rain (hic)?"

Dick exasperated "Johnny, yer a fool. Don't yer see its raining? Can't yer feel it raining? Johnny?"

A tall, slab-sided Yankee, who was making his appearance at Cape May last summer, strolled to the beach during bathing time. On seeing the bevy of beauties disporting in the waves, he burst into a fit of enthusiasm:

"Je-ru-sa-lem! if that don't jest remind me of something good we have at home."

"What is that?" remarked a friend who heard him.

"What is it?" said Jonathan, smacking his lips, "lasses in water."

At a small town up the river a young lawyer who thought himself "some," made certain proposals at a town meeting, which were objected to by a farmer. Highly enraged, he said to the farmer:

"Sir do you know that I have been at two universities, and at two colleges in each university."

"Well, sir," said the farmer, "what of that? I had a calf that sucked two cows, and the observation I made was, the more he sucked the greater calf he grew!"

"Sir," said one of the two antagonists, with great dignity, to the other, during a dispute which had not been confined to words, "you have called me a scoundrel and a liar; you have spit in my face; you have struck me twice; I hope you will not rouse the sleeping lion in my breast, for I cannot tell what may be the consequences."

A "SLEDDING" REMINISCENCE.—On a winter's night, when the moon shone bright, and the snow was crusty, with a maid as fair as seraphs are, I slid from a hill down lower.—Ere we reached the base, (like a horse on a race,) our swift-sliding sled careened; and with tresses fair, streaming back on the air, sweet Sallie went end over end.

 Smiths never knew that their father and mother had ever been strangers

Meanwhile, and on the same night,
 Jones returned to his native town—Burlington, I believe—and sought at once the fine black eyes which he had hoped shortly to call his own.
 The pretty widow sat on the sofa, a white kerchief tied carelessly about her round white throat, her black hair laid in silky waves against each rosy cheek.

"Divorce is the word," cried Jones,
 playfully patting her double chin;
 "the fact is, Eliza, I'm rid of that cursed woman, and you and I'll be married to-night. I know how to manage these scoundrels at Trenton.
 A champagne supper—or was it a breakfast?—did the business for them.
 Put on your bonnet and let us go to the preacher's at once dearest."

The widow, who was among widows as peaches among apples; put on her bonnet and took Jones' arm,
 and—

"Just look how handsome it is put on parchment!" cried Jones, pulling out the document before her;
 her's the law that Jacob Jones and Ann Caroline Jones are two."

Putting her plump, gloved hand
 on his shoulder, she did look at it.

"O dear!" she said with her rosy lips, and sank back, half fainting on the sofa.

"O blazes!" cried Jones, and sank beside her, rustling the fatal parchment in his hand, "here's a lot of happiness and champagne gone to run."

It was a hard case. Instead of being divorced and at liberty to marry the widow, Jacob Jones was simply, by the legislature of New Jersey, incorporated into a turnpike company, and what made it worse, authorized to run from Burlington to Bristol! When you reflect that Burlington is located just one mile from Bristol and on the opposite side of the Delaware river; you will observe the extreme hopelessness of Jones' case.

"It's all the fault of that turnpike man who gave them the champagne
 supper—or was it the breakfast?"
 cried Jones, in agony. "If they'd chartered me a turnpike from Pig's Run to Terrapin Hollow, I might have borne it; but the very idea of building a turnpike from Burlington to Bristol bears an absurdity on the face of it."

So it did.
 "And you aint divorced, said Eliza, a tear running down each cheek.
 "No!" thundered Jones, crushing
 his hat between his knees, "and what is worse, the legislature is adjourned,
 and gone home drunk and won't be back till next year!"

It was a hard case.
 The mistake (?) had occurred on the last day of the session, when legislators and transcribing clerks were laboring under a champagne breakfast. Smith's name had been put where Jones' ought to have been,
 and "wisely wearsey," as the latin poet has it.

From the New York Herald.

What is Treason?—Who are Traitors?

Two generations have elapsed since the treason of Burr brought home to the public mind an active sentiment of what constitutes treason, and who are traitors; and living under a free government, about which every citizen is at liberty to say what he pleases, when he pleases and where he pleases, the treason at Harper's Ferry fell at first upon a blunted sense in the public mind as to what that heinous crime against the highest interests of society really is.

But the people are beginning to awaken to a sense of the true depth and bearing of the treasonable abolition conspiracy and invasion of Brown and his Northern co-traitors, and look to the administration of Mr. Buchanan to defend the principles of society, and the very foundations of government among us, by bringing every one of the parties implicated to the bar of justice. The Constitution of the United States defines this highest crime against society in these words:

"Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort."

This has been further defined by the judiciary in several decisions
 bearing upon the point in question,
 in the following clear and distinct terms:

"To constitute a levying of war
 there must be an assemblage of persons for the purpose of carrying into effect, by force, a treasonable purpose. [—Ex parte Ballman, 4 Cranch.

 75.]

"In order to constitute the offence
 of treason against the United States,
 there should be a conspiracy to resist,
 generally and publicly, by force, and an actual resistance by force, or by intimidation of numbers, against a law of the United States. [—United States vs. Hanway, 2 Wallace, Jr., 130.]

"Where war is levied, all those who take any part in it, however minute or however remote, from the scene of action, and who are actually leagued in the general conspiracy,
 are regarded as traitors. [—*Ex parte
 Ballman*, 4 Cranch, 75.]

Here we have the law of treason,
 and who are traitors, clearly defined:
 So accustomed have thousands of our citizens become to sit under and follow the "higher law" teachings of factious demagogues, that they have forgotten their paramount duty to their country, and the power which society must wield for the maintenance of its own existence. Seward, Chase, Wade, Wilson, Giddings, Gerrit Smith, Greeley, Howe, Sanborn, and numerous other accessaries before the fact, are, equally with John Brown amenable to the law, and it is the duty of every branch of the government to defend the majesty of the law.

Lola Montez.—This somewhat celebrated woman is residing in Brooklyn, N. Y. Lola is now living with some intimate friends, who have stood by her in all her various fortunes. She is said to have really experienced a change of heart, and those that know her best, assert that recently she has lived the life of a devoted and sincere christian. Lola Montez, ever since her marriage with Lieut. Heald, in England, has claimed his name, and has always used it in business transactions. Lola need neither play nor preach, for Heald enjoined in his will that his executor should pay her an annuity of £500 as long as she lived.

Some fellows in Newcastle, Pa., recently started a society, which purported to be a lodge of the Sons of Malta. One of the initiated states that after the ordeal, he signed what was represented to be the constitu-

 out to be an order for a keg of beer upon one of the town brewers. The Club had been indulging in lager at the expense of the new member for several weeks.

 who had fallen into the gutter.—
 "Can't say," replied the policeman.
 "Can't give an account of himself."
 "Of course not," said the other,
 "how can you expect an account
 from a man who has lost his balance?"

Two drunken fellows were walking along in the rain. The drunk-est one then asked:

"Dio (hic) does er rain (hic)?"
 "In course it rains," said Dick.
 The answer was, apparently satisfactory, and they proceeded several rods further, when the question was again propounded by the anxious searcher after truth under difficulties
 "Dick, I say D(hic) tell me does e rain?"

"Johnny," said Dick solemnly,
 "I'm afraid yer drunk; in course its raining."

In a few moments Johnny was again troubled with doubts, and sought to solve them.

"Dick, seems er me (hic) ser-going (hic) er-rain (hic)?"

Dick exasperated. "Johnny; yer
 a fool."

"Don't yer see its raining?" Can't yer feel it rainin'?" Johnny?

A tall, slab-sided Yankee, who was making his appearance at Cape May last summer, strolled to the beach during bathing time. On seeing the bevy of beauties disporting in the waves, he burst into a fit of enthusiasm:

"Je-ru-sa-lem! if that don't jest remind me of something good we have at home."

"What is that?" remarked a friend who heard him.

"What is it?" said Jonathan,
 smacking his lips; "lasses in water."

At a small town up the river a young lawyer who thought himself
 "some," made certain proposals at a town meeting, which were objected to by a farmer. Highly enraged, he said to the farmer:

"Sir do you know that I have been at two universities, and at two colleges
 in each university."

"Well, sir," said the farmer, "what of that? I had a calf that sucked two cows, and the observation I made was, the more he sucked the greater calf he grew!"

"Sir," said one of the two antagonists, with great dignity, to the other,
 during a dispute which had not been confined to words, "you have called me a scoundrel and a liar; you have spit in my face; you have struck me twice; I forgive you; but I will not forgive the sleeping lion in my breast, for I cannot tell what may be the consequences."

A "SLEDDING" REMINISCENCE.—
 On a winter's night, when the moon shone bright, and the snow was crusted o'er, with a maid as fair as seraphs are, I slid from a hill down lower.— Ere we reached the base, (like a horse on a race,) our swift-sliding sled careened; and with tresses fair, streaming back on the air, sweet Sallie
 went end over end.

THE HAPPY PAIR.

BY GOETHE.

It came and went so lightly,
That pleasant summer rain;
Now see, dear wife, how brightly
I gush out our own domain;
Far, far into the distance
The eager eye can roam;
But here is true existence,
And here a happy home.

Down fly the pigeons cooling,
The pretty, graceful thrush
So gentle in their wooing
Beside the fairy springs.
Where, gathering flowers together,
A garland first I wove,
To bright and sunny weather,
For thee, my only love.

Another wreath I plaited,
As well rememberest thou,
That day when we were mated,
And took the happy vow.
The world was all before us,
To make or choose our way;
And years have stolen o'er us
Since that most blessed day.

The vow which then was spoken,
A thousand times we've sealed,
By many a tender token,
In thick and in field.
On Alpine heights we've tarried,
Together still were we;
Yea, love for us hath carried
His torch across the sea.

On a recent Marriage.

When Sam and Helen tall stood up,
And fast and firm were married;
Right pleasantly o'er such a scene
My fancy hovering tarried.

Bright, manly, honest, stout and true,
Well able to defend her,
No milk-sop or Miss Nanny he,
Yet never "on a tender."

She, graceful, lovely, true and pure,
Quick-witted, kind and tender—
God's blessing on her, happy hours
Unstinted may He send her.

And when small Sams and Helens come,
Sure none could wish them better,
Than just like "pa and ma to be,
Even to the very letter.

All blessings on them both—may they
With hearts still loving warm,
Tread trustfully life's varied path,
Through sunshine and thro' storm.

And when the wrinkled atropos
Shall snip their twined tether,
May they, as now, with smiles lie down,
And happy rise together.

ARMY NEWS.

HEAD-QUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
N. York, Nov. 10th, 1859.

GENERAL ORDERS, NO. 5.

1. The combats between United States troops and hostile Indians, mentioned below in the order of date, with conjoined gallant acts and soldier-like endurance of hardships, highly creditable to the troops, have been brought to the notice of the General-in-Chief, since the publication of General Orders No. 22, of 1858.

1st. September 29, 1858.—Colonel Dixon S. Miles, 2d infantry, (then Lieut. Col. 3d infantry,) commanding Navajo expedition, marched from Fort Defiance with companies A, (Captain Elliot), F, (2d Lieutenant Averell), I, (Captain McLane), and H, (Captain Lindsay's) mounted riflemen; B, 3d infantry, (1st Lieutenant Whipple,) and K, 8th infantry, (1st Lieutenant Willard,)—293 rank and file—and twenty-two guides and spies, under Captain Blas Lucero. The results of this expedition were the capture of eighty horses and six thousand five hundred sheep; a combat of Captain Lindsay, in command of companies F, H, and I, regiment mounted riflemen, with Kay-a-tana's band, in which eight Indians were killed and several wounded, four thousand sheep and seventy horses captured, and privates Wm. Neugent and Mauritz Paulman, of H company, mounted riflemen, killed, and Sergeant John Thompson, of the same company, wounded; and a skirmish by Captain Elliott (company A, regiment mounted riflemen) in which two Indians were killed and three wounded, and one thousand to fifteen hundred sheep captured. Colonel Miles particularly commends Captains Andrew J. Lindsay, and Washington L. Elliott, and 2d Lieut. William W. Averell, who severally commanded separate detachments, and made captures of Indian property; also, Captain George McLane and Lieutenant William B. Lane, of the mounted riflemen, and Captain Blas Lucero, who gallantly participated in Captain Lindsay's engagement.

2d. October 10, 1858.—Brevet Major Wm. T. H. Brooks, Captain 3d infantry, in command of a detachment of mounted riflemen and infantry, with Captain Lucero and a number of spies and guides, attacked and dispersed a band of Indians, southeast of Odo de Oso, New Mexico. Captain Elliott's company, A, regiment mounted riflemen, 1st Lieutenant George L. Willard, with company K, 8th infantry, and 2d Lieutenant Thomas W. Walker, with company G, 3d infantry, were actively engaged, killing or badly wounding twenty-five Indians.

3d. October 17, 1858.—The post-herd of Fort Defiance, N. M., and horses of company G, mounted rifles, guarded by fifteen mounted riflemen and ten infantry, under Sergeant Bernard W. Clark, of company I, mounted rifles, was attacked by three hundred Navajos concealed in ambush. The Sergeant behaved admirably, and was gallantly sustained by his men and the Zuni Indians encamped near by. Sixty-two mules were lost, but the Sergeant succeeded in saving all, except three, of the company horses, with the sheep and cattle under his charge. Captain George McLane, mounted rifles, with twelve men, promptly followed by Captain Andrew J. Lindsay, with company H, and Lieutenant George W. Howland, with company C, mounted rifles, pursued as soon as possible, and in a sharp conflict, private Michael Marrión, of I company, mounted rifles, was killed, private Thomas Keiting, same company, mortally wounded, private John G. Housanan severely wounded, Felix O'Rourke dangerously wounded, and privates Brown and Richard Hill, same company, slightly wounded. The Indians, by scattering, so diminished their trail that it could not be followed, but the country was scoured for miles.

Private Alexander W. Brown, of I company, mounted rifles, chivalrously rescued a wounded comrade, whom the Indians were about bearing off, by killing one Indian, wounding badly another, and riding with his prize to the post under a cloud of arrows.

4th. October 18, 1858.—Colonel Dixon S. Miles, 2d infantry, (then Lieutenant Colonel 3d infantry,) commanding Navajo expedition, marched from Fort Defiance, on the 20th, detached Captain Andrew J. Lindsay and company H, mounted riflemen, Captain George McLane and company I, mounted riflemen, and Lieutenant William B. Lane in command of company F, mounted riflemen—each detachment accompanied by Mexicans and forty Zuni warriors. The detachments, except that under Captain McLane, returned without meeting Indians. The latter captured a number of animals, exchanged a brisk fire with the Navajos, made a daring exploration, in which the Zuni Indians, by misconduct, lost the captures, and returned to camp on the 21st, after an absence of twenty-seven hours, twenty-one of which were spent in the saddle, and much of the time without water, excepting that carried in canteens.

The results of Colonel Miles' scout were the capture one hundred horses, five head of cattle, burning of many wigwams, killing one Navajo, and wounding another, and the loss of two Zuni Indians wounded.

5th. In addition to officers and soldiers mentioned in special reports, Col. Miles, in a supplementary report of the Navajo expedition, has brought the good conduct of Mr. Peter Wilson, his interpreter, and the following non-commissioned officers and soldiers to the notice of the General-in-Chief:—
Mounted riflemen.—1st Sergeant Luke Tracy, and Private John Weismiller, of company A, 1st Sergeant

Hugh McQuaide, Sergeant Cosgrove, and private Robert M. West, of company F; 1st Sergeant Vernon Jackson, and Sergeant John Thompson, of company H; and 1st Sergeant Peter McGrath, and Sergeant George Sunday, of company I.

6th. October 19 to November 18, 1858.—Lieutenant Colonel (then Major,) Electus Backus, 3d infantry, in command of the 2d column of the Navajo expedition—composed of companies E and G, of mounted rifles (Captain Duncan,) companies B, E and I, 8th infantry, and D, 3d infantry (Captain Schroeder,) fifty-five spies and guides, under Captain Valdez, and twenty-two Utah Indians—made a campaign of 80 days in the enemy's country, marching 349 miles. Four Indians were killed, and four or more wounded; 35 Navajo horses captured and ten shot, 278 goats and 22 sheep captured. One officer (the gallant Captain Valdez) wounded.

Lieutenant Colonel Backus also particularly commends Captains Duncan and Morris of the rifles; Captain Schroeder, who commanded the infantry; Lieutenant Milton Cogswell, 8th infantry, who in command of a detachment, made an important reconnaissance, resulting in a skirmish with Indians and the capture of animals; Lieutenant John R. Cooke, and Lieutenant Henry M. Lazelle, 8th infantry, Lieutenant Herbert M. Enos, mounted riflemen, and assistant Surgeon, William W. Anderson, Medical Department.

7th. October 23, 1858.—1st Lieutenant George W. Howland, Mounted riflemen, in command of twenty men of Company "C," Mounted Riflemen, accompanied by Captain Blas Lucero, with forty guides and spies, left Fort Defiance, and on the second day out surprised and captured twenty Indians (four men and sixteen women and children), ten horses and twenty goats and sheep.—Credit is given to Capt. Lucero for planning the surprise.

8th. January 9, 1859.—Brevet Lieut. Colonel William Hoffman, Major 6th Infantry charged, with the duty of selecting a site for a military post in the Mohave country, Department of California, was escorted by a detachment of the 1st Dragoons, Lieut. Alfred B. Chapman in command. A large number of Mohaves 250 to 300, having approached in a threatening manner, were attacked and driven by Lieut. Chapman, with a platoon of his command—killing and wounding 10 or 12 Indians.—Colonel Hoffman mentions the vigilance, energy, and soldierly bearing of Lieut. Chapman and the good conduct of his men.

9th. January 31, 1859.—2d Lieut. Henry M. Lazelle, 8th infantry, marched from Fort Bliss, Texas, in command of 30 men, of company D, Mounted Riflemen, to follow a band of Mescalero Apaches, who had committed depredations on San Elizario. On the 7th day, after an arduous march, much of which was without water, found a fresh trail, and with twenty-two men, leaving the remainder as a guard for the animals, marched cautiously during the night and made an attack on 50 or 60 Indians, but without surprising them. A sharp conflict ensued, and Lieut. Lazelle gallantly continued in the action after he had been shot through the lungs, and until he had entirely extricated his command. Lieutenant Lazelle speaks of the noble and soldierly conduct of Sergeant John Delancy and Corporal Gerald Russell, and the coolness and bravery of Privates McCullum, Carr, Reese, Burke and Harrington. He also commends the brave intelligence of his guide, Mr. Garcia. Loss of the troops, 3 killed and 7 wounded. Killed—Privates John F. Ogden, Wm. R. Samper, and Patrick Newman. Wounded—2d Lieutenant Henry M. Lazelle, 8th infantry, and Privates James Golden, Lawrence Burke, severely; and George Harrington, Jesse A. Reese, James Atcheson, and William W. Allen, slightly. Nine Maclay, 8th infantry, commanding Fort Inge, Texas, to accompany a party of citizens to recover a number of horses stolen from a citizen. On the 13th, the soldiers in advance discovered a party of six Indians. Three were killed in the action which ensued, and of the fifty-eight horses stolen, forty-nine were retaken, seven being killed by the Indians on the trail, and two in action. To the good conduct of Sergeant Maloney, and the men under his command, Captain Maclay ascribes the success of the expedition.

11th. February 23, 1859.—Lieutenant James E. Powell, 1st infantry, left Fort Arbuckle, C. N., in command of a detachment from companies D and E, 1st cavalry, and E, 1st infantry, accompanied by twenty-seven Wichitas, who volunteered as guides.

Next morning, when about thirty-two miles from Fort Arbuckle, Lieutenant Powell, leaving his pack mules with the infantry, rode forward with the cavalry, and soon encountered and pressed hard a band of Comanches, who abandoned their horses to take position in a deep, narrow, and crooked ravine, fringed with a dense growth of briars. Lieutenant Powell dismounted his cavalry, and aided by seven men of the infantry, who meantime had joined him, carried the well-defended position of the Indians, and dispersed them. The enemy left five men on the field killed, five animals and a number of blankets, and horse equipments, were captured.

He also mentions the seven men of the infantry, who, by great exertion, were enabled to participate in the fight; viz., Lance, Corporal O'Sullivan, Privates Rourke, Cummin, Favery, Weir, Woods, Dillon, and Eshman, all of company E, 1st infantry. Rourke behaved very gallantly.

12th. February 27, 1859.—1st Lieutenant David S. Stanley, 1st cavalry, from Fort Arbuckle, with company D of his regiment, pursued into the Wichita Mountains a marauding party of Comanches, 30 minutes after receiving his orders. After an exciting steeple chase of several miles, over rocks the detachment killed, and left dead upon the field seven Comanches. The prompt and gallant Lieutenant Stanley, mentions with praise Mr. Moncrief and Messrs. Sam. and Ed. Colbert, who accompanied the troops in the chase and fight, and also Delaware guides Wilson, Jackson, and Wagon.

13th. April 19, 1859.—Captain Albert G. Brackett, company I, 2d cavalry, left Fort Lancaster, Texas, to scout on the Great Comanche trail. May 2d, discovered, attacked, and routed, about ten miles below his camp, on the old deserted Presidio de San Vicente, a considerable party of Indians. Captain Brackett expresses his thanks to 2d Lieutenant Wesley Owens, 2d cavalry, and to Judge Wilkinson, who accompanied the scout, and particularly notices the good conduct of 1st Sergeant Gordon and Privates McEnerny and Niell, in the affair of the second of May. His men suffered greatly during the scout from the want of rations, and his horses and mules, from want of water and grass.

sive position. Major Van Dorn, by gallant and skillful dispositions, swept the ravine, occupied by the Indians with dismounted skirmishers, while the mounted troops on the crest of hills, commanded the outlets above and below the position of the enemy. The fight was sharp and bloody, and took place on foot in a thick jungle. The results were killing, wounding and capturing nearly all the Indians—Fifty being killed, five wounded, and thirty-six made prisoners, and more than a hundred animals captured.

Major Van Dorn notices the conspicuous gallantry and energy of 2d Lieutenant Fitzhugh Lee, Adjutant of the expedition, Surgeon James Simmons, and Assistant Surgeon William H. Babcock, Medical Department, Captain Edmund K. Smith, and Lieutenants William B. Royal, Robert Nelson Eagle, George B. Cosby, James B. Withersell, James E. Harrison, and Manning M. Kimmel, 2d cavalry; also the cool courage, daring intrepidity, and gallant bearing throughout the whole engagement of 1st Sergeant J. W. Spangler, company H, 2d cavalry, who, in personal combat, encountered and killed six of the enemy.

The trail was followed over barren and difficult mountains, and on the evening of the 4th day, Lieut. Hazen came up with, and attacked a party of eight or ten Indians, killing four, severely wounding the others, and capturing their property, including seven horses. Messrs. Adams and Hale are highly commended by Lieut. Hazen for their valuable services.

August 4, 1859.—Brevet Major Lewis Armistead, Captain 6th infantry, marched from Fort Mohave, Department of California, in the night, with twenty-five picked men of company F, 6th infantry, to surprise a party of Indians twelve miles distant. Lieut. Elisha G. Marshall, 6th infantry, with the same number of picked men from company I, 6th infantry, made an open demonstration in the same direction the following morning. The Indians, evincing great boldness in a sharp conflict which ensued, but they were repeatedly driven by the troops, and twenty-three of their dead counted on the field. Major Armistead commends the gallant conduct of Lieut. Marshall, 1st Sergeant A. B. Kauffman, F company, 6th infantry, and Mr. Peter Brady, the Post Interpreter. Three men of company I, 6th infantry, were slightly wounded.

17th. August 14, 1859.—Brevet Brigadier General Albert S. Johnson, Colonel 2d cavalry commanding Department of Utah, having received information that a band of Northern Indians had robbed and murdered a party of Emigrants on the California road, detached 2d Lt. Ebenezer Gay, 2d dragoons, in command of co. G, 2d dragoons, from Camp Floyd, to take such steps as circumstances might require. The latter learning, near Box Elder, that the Indians were not distant, resolved to attack them. After a rapid march of two hours, with forty-two dragoons, Lieut. Gay surprised the encampment of the Indians, and charged upon the main body, killing and wounding several. The number of the Indians is estimated from one hundred and fifty to two hundred warriors, of whom some twenty were killed; twenty horses were captured, nearly half being American horses; four men severely, and two slightly wounded; and nine horses wounded. Lieut. II. Corrections and additions to the notices of combats in General Orders, Nos. 14, of 1857, and 22, of 1858:

1st. In paragraph 2, of General Orders, No. 14, of 1857, Lieut. Col. Silas Casey, 9th infantry, should have been designated as commanding the troops of the Puget Sound District.

THE VALLEY TAN.

STEPHEN DEWOLFE, Editor.

Wednesday, Dec. 28, 1899.

Utah, Past and Present.

The writers of almost every nation are in the habit of selecting some portion of the national annals, as a period of greater glory and prosperity, than any which preceded, or which has followed them; and to use it as a standard, by which the progress or declension of the nation is properly measured. Thus, Englishmen tell us of the happy days of "Queen Bess;" Frenchmen, of the greatness of the empire under Louis XIV.; and of its glory under the first Napoleon; Spaniards, of their dominions, and the renown of their name, under the Emperor Charles V.; and of his successor and grandson, Philip II; so on with almost every nation, selecting that portion of their history, in which the greatness and glory of the ruler was found reflected in the prosperity and happiness of the subject, or in the extension of the national dominion and empire. In our own country, it is not unusual or unnatural, to turn from the corruptions, which are too frequently brought to light, in those occupying exalted stations of trust and honor, to the early period in the history of our country, when such things were unknown; and, when those who were promoted to stations of trust and power, appeared intent upon using them only for the weal of those who created them. Imitating this general, if not natural inclination of every other race, to dwell on that period of their history which is deemed brightest and most glorious, the "Latter-day Saints" have, also, through their chosen rulers and mouthpieces, named a period in their history more fruitful, in their opinion, with bright deeds and pleasant memories than the present. That period was two years ago; and we are told, that an "escaping sigh cannot be choked, when the happy and peaceful times, sepulchral then, are compared with the present condition of things in Utah." And what, we ask, was the condition of things in Utah two years ago? Let us take a retrospect of the past, and see what those "peaceful and happy times" were, at which a "sigh cannot be choked."

Two years ago, Utah was in open rebellion against the laws and government of the United States. She had disregarded and set at defiance officers appointed by the government to administer and execute the laws in this Territory. Peaceful and law-abiding citizens who dwell here, had been some of them murdered, and others driven out of the Territory by a horde of miscreants and traitors who had usurped the reins of government here. On the plains, the smoking ashes of trains loaded with government stores, attested the foulness of the treason that rankled here. In Echo Canyon, dykes and battlements had been erected to oppose the passage of troops of the United States. On every hand, "Treason rank and foul reared his hideous front."

Such was the external condition of Utah, towards a government the mildest and most liberal of any on earth, and which only demanded of Utah the same obedience and submission to law which is required of every other State and Territory of which it is composed; what was its internal condition during the same time? A large majority of the people dwelling here then, as now, were foreigners who were ignorant almost of the very form of government under which they dwelt, and knew nothing of its designs and policy beyond what their leaders told them, and on these, they unfortunately placed a blind reliance, as they also, yielded an implicit obedience. Every art and conceivable means were used by these leaders to impress on the minds of these deluded beings, the belief that the government of the United States was seeking to oppress them, and pursuing them with persecutions on account of their religion. They were told that if the army came here, their wives would be ravished by a brutal soldiery—that their homes would disappear beneath the torch of the incendiary, or what was worse, become the abodes of their oppressors—that their property would be given over to pillage and confiscation. These, with a thousand other lies, were told to stimulate the opposition of the deluded masses here, to a government which then, as now, was far more considerate of their rights, than those who erected themselves into the professed and special champions of them.

It is no wonder that by such means, such persons were deceived. We find them, consequently, neglecting the pursuits of quiet and ordinary industry, for which they are really famed, and spending their time in the erection of fortifications, and in the exercise of military evolutions, to oppose the ingress of their supposed enemies into the Territory.

These labors of course, brought no rewards—their families were left without the usual means of support, and of course, were deprived of many of the comforts and necessities of life, so that by the time they were ordered by their imperious dictators to go south, many of them were in a state of actual destitution and want. Such was the condition of affairs in Utah, two years ago. Treason and rebellion without—privation and want within. Yet these are the times that awaken "sighs that cannot be choked," when compared with what they are now. And what are they now? By no means as bright and calm as they might be, but a vast improvement, certainly, on what they were two years ago. The lowering and threatening clouds which then overspread the sky, and seemed charged with lightning and tempest, have retired to the horizon, and now display their wrath in distant and muttered thunders. Treason, which then stalked openly and publicly abroad, now seeks some little disguise. "The snake has been spotted, but not killed." Citizens, thanks to the presence of an army near here, can dwell with some little security more than they could two years ago; true, their rights are still violated in some respects, but their treatment is merciful at present, compared with what it once was. They are sometimes now assassinated in the dark; and of course no one knows, or can find out, whence the blow came that destroyed them; but they are not openly told in a court, professing to be a court of law and justice, that their "necks will be wrung like that of chicken," if they venture to assert their rights against a Mormon. Federal courts can now be held, and Federal Judges discharge their duty, without danger of intimidation from armed bands of rowdies and bullies, but it is a well understood fact, that Mormon juries are not going to convict one of their fraternity for crimes committed against a "gentile." They will seldom, indeed, try one of their members for any offenses of this kind. In some cases, no effort whatever is made to find out the perpetrators of crime, as was the case with the murderers of Drown, Arnold and Vincent; in others, where the crime, performed in open day, and in the sight of hundreds of citizens, the murderer was quietly permitted to make his escape. But if any of them are arrested, even, they are not brought to trial, for a grand jury interposes, and "ignores" any bill against them, as was the case with the man who killed the deaf and dumb boy a year ago. But why enumerate particular instances; when it is believed, on good evidence, that over two hundred murders have been committed in this Territory, within the past three years, that were incited and participated in by Mormons; and yet not a single offender has been brought to trial and punishment therefor. This fact alone, proves how much respect is had for life here; and on what a basis the good order and quietude which prevails in Utah rests.

But we did not set out to record facts which have been time again repeated, but which appear to be entirely overlooked or disregarded, and we renew our contrast between Utah, as it now is, and as it was two years ago. Instead of the want and destitution which prevailed the dwellers in this valley, probably never before enjoyed as much prosperity as they have with the year which is now closing. They have realized extravagant prices for all the surplus products which they have raised, and have been thereby enabled to surround themselves with comforts and luxuries before unknown or not enjoyed. A common remark—and one that is apparent to the most casual observer—is, the great change and improvement that has taken place in the dress and style of the people here, since the army came into the valley. We mention this only as illustrative of their general improvement and advancement in the art of living what has taken place, and which establishes beyond doubt, the increased prosperity which exists at present over what was possessed during the "peaceful happy times" which existed two years ago. Our remarks might be extended to many other matters besides those to which we have referred, in proof that the condition of the people of Utah is immeasurably superior now, to what it was two years ago; but we deem it useless to write farther about a fact which is so palpable.

We have introduced the subject only to show upon what events, and what period in the history of the saints they look back to with most satisfaction and pride.

FATAL RECOUNT.—From the Territorial Enterprise of Nov. 26th, we learn that a fatal encounter took place at Carson City, on the 19th of Nov., between John L. Blackburn, Deputy United States Marshall, and James N. Stephenson, a station keeper, on the Humboldt, in which the latter was instantly killed.

The difficulty first originated in some approbrious term applied by Stephenson to Blackburn. A jury was summoned on the spot, who returned a verdict in accordance with the facts of the case, and was examined before Judge Cradlebaugh on the 24th of November; but the result of the investigation is not given.

Christmas has Come.

Ring, ye merry bells, ring! and let the joyful fact be known, that even in these "valleys of the mountains," the time for egg nog and Santa Claus, has come again. The anniversary birth-day of Him whose mission brought peace on earth and good will to men, has again come and gone, throughout the world. Among the ten thousand salutations that have been uttered throughout the earth, we, too, have ours to offer. We confess that we are somewhat dilapidated from the effect of potatoes: deep, gotten up in the most elaborate style, with long and short sweetenings. Visions of balls, parties, roast turkeys and pretty girls are still flitting before us, as we sit in our sanctum; but duty and an anxious desire to earn, in season, the money with which to buy our summer's clothing, compels us, in spite of our head-ache, heart-ache, and several hundred other misfortunes, to greet our readers; one and all, upon an occasion of such universal joy. We intended to hang up our stockings, but the mournful fact of having but one pair, and the uncertain liberality of our most intimate friends, kept us from the repetition of an old dist appointment.

The past year has been full of events of the most startling kind—a review of the most important we will not attempt now, knowing full well that by-gones are better let alone. Mrs. Stiekles, the Great Eastern, and the Atlantic Telegraph have had their day. John Brown has gone up, so has the price of flour in Utah; but the man who went up in the last balloon, has not yet come down. Horace Greeley, Lucy Stone, and the Era-ive Soap Man are all lecturing for the worthy purpose of turning an honest penny. Much has been done, and much remains to be done; and as the clock says, "some things can be done as well as others," we would suggest and recommend a great deal, but modesty prevents. And if our readers will but anticipate our wishes, we promise them a paper which, for original matter, selected with great care by our "devil" and his scissors, shall be unsurpassed by any in Utah. Hoping that the Lord will take a liking to all our readers, and particularly, to our paying subscribers, we greet them all with a merry Christmas, and a happy new year.

The Eastern Mail arrived yesterday evening in its usual good time. We had but a short time to look through our exchanges, previous to the time at which our paper went to press. We select one or two dispatches, that we deemed of particular interest. John Brown, it will be seen, was executed on the second of December, in conformity with the sentence first past upon him. After this event, the most important which we observe, is, that Government troops have ordered to take possession of the frontier provinces of Mexico.

Special Dispatch to the Missouri Republican. Important from Washington.

NORTHERN STATES OF MEXICO TO BE SEIZED.

TROOPS ORDERED FROM FORTS MONROE AND LEAVENWORTH.

WASHINGTON, November 19, 2. a. m.—The Government this morning determined to seize the Northern States of Mexico, and orders have just issued for six companies of heavy artillery from Fort Monroe, two of light artillery and three of foot from Fort Leavenworth, to proceed immediately to Brownsville. Considerable excitement prevails here.

HARPER'S FERRY, Dec. 2.—Brown was hung at quarter past eleven. The military assembled at nine o'clock, and were posted on the field leading to the execution, and also at various points, as laid down in general orders. Everything was conducted under the strictest discipline, as if the town was in a state of siege. Mounted scouts were stationed in the woods to the left of the scaffold, and picket guards stationed out towards Shenandoah Mountains in the rear. The military on field formed two hollow squares. Within the inner one was the scaffold, and between the inner line and outer lines the citizens were admitted—no one being allowed outside the lines except the mounted guards. At 11 o'clock the prisoner was brought out of the jail, accompanied by Sheriff Campbell, and assistants, and Captain Avis, the jailer, when a small wagon containing a white pine coffin was driven up, upon which he took his seat. Six companies of Infantry and Rifles, and one company Horse, General and Staff, numbering twenty-five officers; headed the procession, and moved towards the place of execution. Brown was accompanied by no minister, desiring no religious ceremonies either in the jail or on the scaffold. He looked calmly around on the people, fully possessed; mounted the scaffold with a firm step; his arms pinioned by the Sheriff, bid farewell to Captain Avis and Sheriff Campbell; and at half past eleven the trap of the scaffold was pulled away, and with a few slight struggles, John Brown yielded up his spirit. His body was placed in a coffin, and is now on his way to Harper's Ferry, to be delivered to his wife, under strict military escort.

CINCINNATI, Nov. 28.—The venerable Washington Irving died last evening at Irvington.

Frances Amelia's Papa.

The Sacramento (Cal.) Union, contains some comments on this gentleman as little creditable to his veracity, as the parade and fuss which he recently made over his daughter's marriage to the rich Cuban in New York, were creditable to his sense or taste.

Hear the Union in regard to the exalted pretensions set up by the late Lieutenant.

Washington A. Bartlett, the father of the rash and unfortunate young woman who married the four millions of Cuban estate recently, in New York, has taken to letter writing. The prospect secured to him by his son-in-law, who, if not handsome, has shown how to do the handsome thing, in intimating that he (the papa) need give himself no care for his worldly future, has struck in, as it feared it would, and is producing unpleasant consequences. A few days ago we saw a letter, written to one of the New York journals, in which, with the ostensible object of correcting some silly statement of a reporter, he paraded the information of his daughter having received and responded to the old Cuban's vows of love in Spanish. "Inasmuch as she has spoken and written the Spanish and French languages from childhood." In a later exchange we find an extract from what appears to be another letter from the Bartlett, which contains a very singular statement indeed, relative to that part of his career remembered of connection with the early events on this coast. But let us quote the whole language of his complaint, which is very characteristic, and purports to have been called forth by the publicity given to his daughter's marriage. Hear our ancient snob:

"Is it a crime against society to have a large circle of acquaintance, and to write to them to witness a marriage ceremony? Is it any fault of ours that thousands surrounded the church who had not been invited? And having a large acquaintance among the gentlemen of the editorial fraternity—having been myself twenty-five years in the public service, and been associate proprietor and editor of journals on both sides of our continent—(having myself written the first editorial ever penned in the now famous city of San Francisco, and with my own hands, when Chief Magistrate there, pulled the press for the first printed sheet ever printed in that city)—was it so remarkable, then, that I should hold that editors were gentlemen, and therefore worthy to be presented to any family, even if I did not happen to know every one who, having scribbled a paragraph, writes himself down as of the 'Press,' and presumes to write notes for cards of invitation which I was obliged to refuse, and thus, perhaps, got up a feeling of hostility?"

Poor Bartlett! His trials have commenced early for a man who was henceforth to live with out care. But what appears most to his disadvantage is, that he seems to have construed his permit to live without care into a privilege to be careless about his facts. Now, Frances Amelia's papa knows that he stated what was untrue in the above parenthesis—that he coined it solely from his own brain. In other words, Chevalier Bartlett drew upon his imagination when he stated that he wrote the first editorial, pulled the first sheet, etc., etc., in San Francisco. He did nothing of the sort. He was neither an editor or a proprietor of a newspaper, but an impudent, shallow and egotistical Lieutenant, whom Commodore Sloat or Stockton appointed to the Alcaide ship in San Francisco on account of his acquaintance with the Spanish language. The fact would be of no consequence, and has been stated once before in these columns; but the recollection of the first Alcaide is not as sweet a savor in the nostrils of our early settlers, and we have no wish to perceive the history of our newspaper press tainted with the odor of Bartlett's doings when in California.

IRON WEALTH OF MISSOURI.—An assistant of the Missouri Geological Survey gives in volume I. of their report an estimate of the iron ore in the celebrated iron region of that State, as follows: Iron Mountain, 228 feet high, covering 600 acres, one mass of specular ore weighing 230,187,275 tons; average yield at furnace 86 per cent, or 128,904,930 tons of pure iron. Pilot Knob, next in richness, is estimated to contain 13,972,763 tons of ore, 7,000,000 tons of pure iron. These two deposits will furnish about 136,000,000 tons of iron, the ore of which all lies above the natural surface of the country, easily mined and furnishing the best of metal. Railroad iron, 70 lbs. to the yard, takes 1,282 tons to the mile, and all the railroads in the United States would take of that weight of rails about 3,500,000 tons of iron, or 1-40 of the deposit above spoken of. This is only the ore above the surface. God only knows what is below.

MORMON REGENERATION.—The Cincinnati Commercial has it from an elder that the Illinois Mormons held a conference in De Kalb county, last month, at which delegates from five States were present. The object of the conference was to procure an organization to make head against the heresies of the Utah Mormons, and especially polygamy. A paper is to be published in Cincinnati devoted to the dissemination of the true faith, and missionaries are to be sent to Salt Lake to reclaim the backsliding of that church there. The organization will not be complete until a son of Joe Smith is at its head.

GUAYMAS THREATENED WITH BOMBARDMENT BY A U. S. SHIP-OF-WAR.—The Alta publishes the following statement, as received from Capt. Way, of the schooner Storm Cloud, which sailed from Guaymas on the evening of the 16th October:

The U. S. sloop-of-war St. Marys, Capt. Porter, arrived at Guaymas on Sunday, 16th October. The Storm Cloud, (Capt. Way's vessel,) was at anchor in the harbor at the same time. Capt. Porter immediately put springs on his cable, and brought the broadside of the St. Marys to bear upon the town. Capt. Way went on board, and was requested by Capt. Porter to accompany his first lieutenant ashore with his dispatches, and introduce him to the Prefect, Mr. Robinson, which he did. These dispatches in substance demanded the immediate restoration of Capt. Stone and his surveying party in Sonora, with full permission to proceed in the performance of the contract—a refusal to accede to the demand being accompanied with a notification that the town would be bombarded next morning by the St. Marys. Capt. Way accompanied the Lieutenant on shore, and introduced him to the Prefect, Mr. Robinson, to whom he saw the dispatches delivered. Without receiving a definite answer, they returned on board the St. Marys. Capt. Porter informed Capt. Way that he had sent a boat for Capt. Stone's brig, then lying at anchor at a point some distance away from Guaymas—intending to place Capt. Stone's party in full and undisputed occupancy of their rights under their contract. Capt. Way went on board his vessel, and sailed the same evening for San Francisco, leaving the frowning batteries of the St. Marys bearing on the Mexican town, with a son of old Commodore Porter in charge, ready to carry his determination into effect on the following morning, in the event of the Mexicans refusing to comply with his demand.

SENATOR DOUGLAS for some months past has been more talked about and written of than any man in the Union. Scarcely do we open a paper that has not something in it of S. A. Douglas. Editors, correspondents and public speakers are determined to keep him before the people. Since his arrival at home Horace Greeley has entered the lists against Douglas in a long article addressed to him personally, in reply to his article in "Harper's Magazine." Those numerous articles in reply to the essay and speeches of the Senator are the highest compliments the writers can pay him. They prove, too, that the extreme men of the Republican and Democratic parties dread the effect of Douglas' articles, and speeches on the public mind, or they would not expend so much labor and zeal to refute the arguments they contain in favor of popular sovereignty. The ultra Republicans at the North and the extreme Secession State Rights Democrats at the South are severe in their comments upon Douglas and his Territorial views.—Sac. Union.

EXTENSIVE CONCERN.—Adams' express employs 3,782 men, 1,784 horses, it has 972 agencies, and its messengers travel daily 40,152 miles on railroads and steamboats; a distance equal to once around the globe and two-thirds around it a second time.

A preacher once gave the following excellent advice to the young and unmarried portion of his hearers. It is brief, and excellent in its way:

"I want you, my young sinners, to kiss and get married, and then devote your time to morality and money-making. Then let your homes be provided with such comforts and necessities as piety, pickles, pots and kettles; brushes, brooms, benevolence, bread, virtues, wine and wisdom. Have these always on hand, and happiness will be with you. Do not drink anything intoxicating, eat moderately, go about business after breakfast, lounge a little after dinner, chat after tea, and kiss after quarreling. Then all the joy, the peace, and bliss the earth can afford shall be yours until the grave closes over you, and your spirits are borne to a brighter and happier world."

Dr. Johnson's Eloquence.—With all Dr. Johnson's wordiness, there is scarcely any syllable to be spared of the following description:

"Who, when he first saw the sand and ashes by a casual intension, of heat melted into a metallic form, rugged with excrescences, and clouded with impurities, would have imagined that in this shapeless lump lay so many conveniences of life as would in time constitute a great part of the happiness of the world? Yet by some such fortuitous liquefaction was mankind taught to produce a body at once in a high degree solid and transparent, which might admit the light of the sun, and exclude the violence of the wind; which might extend the light of the philosopher to new ranges of existence, and charm him at one time with the unbounded extent of material creation, and at another with the endless subordination of animal life, and what is of yet more importance, might supply the decays of nature, and succor old age with subsidiary light. Thus was the first artificer in glass employed without his knowledge or expectation. He was facilitating and prolonging the enjoyment of light, enlarging the avenues of science, and conferring the highest and most lasting pleasures. He was enabling the student to contemplate nature, and the beauty to behold herself."

Friendship does not consist in words; in great dinners or unmeaning smiles. Show me the man who will break his last loaf with me, and I will believe that man a friend.

A lady's face, like the coat in the "Tale of a Tub," will wear well if left alone, but if you attempt to load it with foreign ornaments, you destroy the original ground.

A Rare Swindle.

A nice little piece of swindle was transacted in this city a few months since of the following character, and which has recently been brought to light. It seems that an unsuspecting Secretary of the Board of Education, G. I. N. Monell, on board of one of the boats plying between this city and San Francisco last summer with an individual, introduced himself to him as his cousin, R. T. Monell, and in the course of conversation stated circumstances that left very little doubt, in the mind of the Secretary, that it was indeed in that near and interesting relation. Having come to whom he had never seen, and quite natural that he should possess this was one of them; and he accordingly introduced him in Sacramento as such. If we are rightly informed, the cousin, in process of time, possessed himself in the mines, or elsewhere, of what purported to be a bag of gold dust, valued at about $1,500, which, after a formal introduction by his alleged and obliging relative in this city, he deposited with the banking firm of T. S. Fisk & Co., for shipment to the American Exchange Bank, New York, through Freeman & Co.'s Express. Having secured confidence in this way, and having laid broad and deep the foundations of his financial credit, he proceeded to be favored with, and accordingly received an advance of the sum of $500 on the strength of said bag of treasure, stating at the same time that he was going home and would redeem the sack from the New York house, paying the advance $500, all proper charges. In the progress of human events and in this particularly fast age, the sack address reached the American Exchange Bank, but the interesting cousin, R. T. Monell, not making his appearance, it was opened and found to contain shot—value considerably less than gold. Advances were soon forwarded to Sacramento, where inquiry for some time was made in vain for the sharp practitioner, but it was at last found that he probably took passage for the East by the steamer of August 20th, or thereabouts, under the name of Smith, or some other alias. It is strongly suspected that his place of residence is in New York or Wisconsin.

The result of the affair is, and this is the most definite information we are able to ascertain, that an indictment has been found by the Grand Jury of this county against the said individual for the crime of obtaining money under false pretenses, and Governor of New York and Wisconsin for the body of said R. T. Monell, alias. The requisition was dispatched by the last steamer, and L. C. Baker, a well known San Francisco detective, has been appointed agent to receive the individual and bring him to this locality. It is hardly necessary to say that if our Secretary of the Board of Education ever had any belief that the personage under consideration ever was a cousin, it has been entirely uprooted, and wholly abandoned in view of the nefarious proceedings. It is strongly suspected that the cousin's "education" has been sadly neglected.—Sac. Union.

GRIZZLIES ON THE CARSON ROAD.—The Amador Ledger thus refers to the inhabitants on the West Carson road to Carson Valley:

George McKenzie, who is freighting goods to Genoa, Carson Valley, by way of West Carson, forms me that there is a distance of ten or twelve miles where the road passes through a thick chaparral country, that bears are numerous and exceedingly bold. On the last McKenzie had gone six or eight miles in advance of his teams to assist a man whose cattle had strayed off. He came up to the wagon about dark, and found the man alone, and the presence of three full grown grizzlies which were grubbing at gnashing their teeth. That night they attacked the wagon and tried to get at some bacon which composed part of the load. McKenzie and the owner of the wagon remained up all night and kept them at bay by using fire brands. Whenever they would approach the bears with fire they would scamper off and run up the road, and in a few moments return and renew the attack. This was kept up until three o'clock in the morning, when the varmints left in pairs unknown.

Four things come not back, broken word, the sped arrow, past life, and the neglected opportunity.

A Reflective Retrospect.

BY JOHN G. SAGE.

"Tis twenty years, and something more,
Since, all ahint for useful knowledge,
I took some draughts of classic lore,
Drawn, very mild, at—rd. College;

Yet I remember all that one
Could wish to hold in recollection;
The boys, the joys, the noise, the fun,
But not a single Conic Section.

I recollect those harsh affairs,
The morning bells that gave us panic,
I recollect the formal prayers,
That seemed like lessons in Mechanics;

I recollect the drowsy way
In which the students listened to them,
As clearly, in my wig, to-day,
As when, a boy, I slumbered through
them.

I recollect the tutors all
As freshly now, if I may say so,
As any chapter I recall
In Homer or Ovidius Naso.
I recollect, extremely well,
"Old Hugh," the mildest of fanatics,
I well remember Matthew Bell,
But very faintly Mathematics.

I recollect the prizes paid
For lessons fathomed to the bottom,
(Alas, that pencil-marks should fade!)
I recollect the chaps who got 'em—
The light equestrians who soared
O'er every passage reckoned stony,
And took the chalks—but never scored
A single honor to the pony!

Ah!—what changes Time has wrought,
And how predictions have miscarried—
A few have reached the goal they sought,
And some are dead and some are married;
And some in city journals war;
And some as politicians bicker;
And some are pleading at the bar,
For jury-verdicts, or for liquor!

And some on Trade and Commerce wait;
And some in schools with dunces battle.
And some the Gospel propagate;
And some the choicest breeds of cattle;
And some are living at their ease;
And some were wrecked in the "revul-sion";
Some serve the State for handsome fees,
And one, I hear, upon compulsion!

LAMONT, who, in his college days,
Thought 't'was a cross a moral scandal,
Has left his Puritanic ways,
And worships now with bell and candle;
And MANN, who mourned the negro's
fate,
And held the slaves as most unlucky,
Now holds him, at the market rate,
On a plantation in Kentucky!

TOM KNOX, who swore in such a tone
It fairly might be doubted whether
It really was himself alone,
Or Knox and Erebus together—
Has grown a very altered man,
And, changing oaths for mild entreaty,
Now recommends the Christian plan
To savages in Otaheite!

Alas, for young ambition's vow,
How envious Fate may overthrow it!
Poor Harvey is in Congress now,
Who struggled long to be a poet;
Smith carves (quite well) memorial stones,
Who tried in vain to make the law go;
Hall deals in hides; and "Pious Jones"
Is dealing fare in Chicago!

And, sadder still, the brilliant Hays,
Once honest, manly, and ambitious,
Has taken lately to ways,
Extremely profligate and vicious;
By slow degrees I can't tell how—He's reached at least the very ground-sel.

And in New York he figures now,
A member of the Common Council

A Fifth Avenue Lady Burying Books.

A correspondent of the Newport
News tells the following anecdote:
A certain New York lady, whom I shall call Mrs. X., recently had the good luck to come into the possession of a handsome fortune. No sooner had this agreeable change in her condition been effected, than she immediately had a loud call from the direction of Fifth avenue, and yielding to the tempter, prevailed upon her husband to abandon his calling
as a purveyor in provisions and fish,
and to purchase a residence in that aristocratic neighborhood. In due time her house, was furnished in a style of magnificence that vied with
"the very best." Keeping her eyes open for every new improvement,
she recently discovered "it was about the right thing" to have books, and desirous of being up with the fashion
at once ordered an elegant rosewood
book case, and started out to purchase the material wherewith it was to be filled.

Provided with a diagram illustrating the dimensions of the library—the length, breadth, height of the shelves, and so on—she called upon one of our largest publishers, and handing an astonished clerk the measure,
told him she "wanted the poetical
books he'd got—them with red backs,
and to be sure and make them all fit
the library." With this the lady moved away as majestically as a full-blown turkey cock under full sail.
In due time the books went, but such was the novelty of the order, that in exercising his taste, the clerk selected some a little too long, others too short; some bound in Russia, some in Turkey, some in calf, while the colors of the collection were as varied as the hues of the rainbow.—

This didn't suit, and a day or two brought the whole batch back, Mrs.
X. following close upon them, looking as stiff as if she had been poured into gorgeous clothes, like a candle,
in a state of liquefaction, and had then
"set." "I sent yer books back," said
she, "because I told ye to make 'em
all of one size and one color, and them ain't no more alike than a parcel of nigger babies is like white children." "But, madam," ventured the clerk, "we supposed there were some particular works you would like to have." "No," said she, with an emphasis as if she were dictating to her cook, "I don't care what's in 'em; all I want is books to fill them shelves, that has got red backs, and will look genteel in my new library."

There was no mistaking that order, and this time the "red backs"
went; and are probably now adorning one of our "homes of art, taste and refinement." Think of it, ye shades of Shakespeare, Burns, Byron, Moore and brother worthies; your brain bought by the square inch—
But such is life.

COLOR OF ARAB HORSES.—A writer in Blackwood, speaking of horse dealing in Syria, and the color
of Arab horses, says:

Gray, of various shades, bay chestnut and brown, are the ordinary,
and it may almost be said, the only colors of an Arab horse. The commonest of all colors is one which I recollect as being very frequent among the Arabs met in India, a dark, uniform, nutmeg gray. Light gray verging upon white is neither rare nor peculiar to old horses.— Next to gray in frequency comes bay and chestnut, both fine and rich in quality, and the latter so prized above all colors by the Arabs that they have a saying that if you ever hear of a horse performing any remarkable feat you will be sure to find upon inquiry that he is a chestnut.— Brown is not unfrequent, and in my register of horses brought from Anazeh, I find one black. But so rare is that color that if I had merely trusted to my recollection, I should have said I never saw a black horse in the desert. Of other colors I saw none, except in the solitary instance of a skewbald; and I cannot at this moment undertake to say that he was an Anazeh, or belong to some of the tribes where the purity of the breed can less be depended on.

SMOKING IN HOLLAND.—In Mr.
Hilliard's letter to the Boston Courier
he states that he rode in the second class car from Rotterdam to the Hague, with nine Hollanders, who,
as soon as the train started, "whipped out a cigar or a pipe and began to smoke as men ought to seek righteousness." After an hour's ride, he says, "it seemed to me that the smoke had become a solid and palpable substance, which might have been cut and taken out in blocks and slices." He speaks as follows
of this national peculiarity:

"And here let me say that until you come to Holland you never can know how much humanity can accomplish in the way of smoking. It is hardly too much to say that every man, every youth, and nearly every boy smokes all the time he is awake, at least. The acts of living and of smoking seem synonymous. (As soon as a Dutchman begins to live
he begins to smoke, and as soon as he ceases to smoke he ceases to live.—
The smoking of tobacco and the drinking of gin may perhaps be regarded as sanitary precautions against a wet climate and a sodden soil; if so, the Dutch are to be commended for the good care they take of their health."

A STATUE OF SENATOR BENTON.
—Horatio Stone, the sculptor, has matured and modeled his design of a statue to the late Thomas Hart Benton as he often appeared before the American Senate. It is just and appropriate that the form and semblance of Mr. Benton should be thus preserved for the future generations, whose estimate of his character and influence in the era of his activity
will increase with the lapse of years.
Mr. Stone has been happy in his conception of this faithful portrait of the man and truthful portrait of the spirit that was in him. It is the statesman and the orator who stands before us, commanding in appearance,
and natural and unconstrained in position and bearing. We are informed that it has been designed in pursuance of the purpose of the artist to produce a colossal statue for the adornment of some appropriate place in the city of St. Louis.—Nat. Int.

CAPT. COOK'S CONFESSION.—The confession of Capt. Cook, which was read in court, in Charleston, on Tuesday, is jealously guarded for purposes to be hereafter developed.
It is said to throw but little light on the Harpers Ferry affair, and to be mostly a record of Cook's personal experience. It relates how he first became acquainted with Brown in 1856, just after the battle of Black Jack, how he was induced to join Brown to co-operate with him in his efforts for securing the freedom of Kansas; how certain expeditions for rescuing slaves from Missouri, and setting them free in Canada, were accomplished, and similar details. The more important portions are those which tell of the Convention held in Canada, at which the well-known constitution was framed; of the military training under Stevens, which Brown's party went through, altering their original intention, was to be instructed by Col. Forbes, and of his own exploration of Jefferson County, Virginia, under Brown's directions, to prepare the way for the insurrection. Gerrit Smith, Fred.
Douglass, Dr. S. G. Howe, and others are mentioned in the confession
in such a way as to deeply implicate
them.

THE BASHFUL MAN.—Washington Irving, at a party in England
one day, playfully asserted that the love of annexation which the Anglo-Saxon race displayed on every occasion proceeded, probably, from its mauvaise honte rather than its greediness. As a proof, he cited the story of a bashful friend of his, who, being asked to a dinner party, sat down at the table next to the hostess in a great state of excitement; owing to his recuse life. A few glasses of wine, mounting to his brain, completed his confusion, and dissipated the small remains of his presence of mind. Casting his eyes down, he saw on his lap some white linen.—
"My heavens," thought he, "that's my shirt protruding at my waistband."
He immediately commenced to tuck
in the offending portion of his dress;
but the more he tucked in the more there seemed to remain. At last he made a desperate effort, when a sudden crash around him, and a scream from the company, brought him to his senses. He had been all the time stuffing the table cloth into his breeches, and the last time had swept everything clean off the table.
Thus our bashful annexed a table cloth, thinking it the tail of his own shirt.

About a month ago a widow lady in the north part of Onondaga, New York, was awakened from her slumbers at eleven o'clock at night.—
Opening the door, a man said he wanted to warm himself, and being allowed to do so, he was followed by another man who had a new born babe in his arms. Their business was evident. They persuaded the widow lady to receive the child and care for it, at the same time leaving a considerable sum of money for her trouble. Three weeks after, they reappeared in the night
as suddenly and bore the child away.

thou hast done, while in the world,

ed."

The Scientific American states
that there are in the city of New York about 200,000 smokers, each using two cigars daily, making 400,- 000 cigars every day. These, at an average of four cents each, make the enormous sum of $16,000 daily consumed in smoke, in New York alone. There are some 900,000,000 cigars manufactured in that city annually, which, at the same price
amount to $36,000,000.

plied Dunning, "you had better go

The following beautiful poem, by Geo. D. Prentice, Editor of the Louisville Journal, appeared, we believe, some years ago, in one of the popular magazines of the day. It possesses merits beyond those of a transient kind, and will bear repetition as often as the season returns to which it relates:

The Closing Year.

'Tis midnight's holy hour, and silence now
Is brooding, like a gentle spirit, o'er
The still and pulseless world. Hark! on the winds,
The bell's deep tones are swelling; 'tis the knell
Of the departed year. No funeral train
Is sweeping past; yet, on the stream and wood,
With melancholy light, the moonbeams rest
Like a pale, spotless shroud; the air is stirred,
As by a mourner's sigh; and, on you cloud,
That floats so still and placidly through heaven,
The spirits of the Seasons seem to stand,
Young Spring, bright Summer, Autumn's solemn form,
And Winter, with his aged locks,—and breathe
In mournful cadences, that come abroad
Like the far wind-harp's wild, touching wail,
A melancholy dirge o'er the dead year,
Gone from the earth forever.

'T is a time
For memory and for tears. Within the deep,
Still chambers of the heart, a specter dim,
Whose tones are like the wizard voice of Time,
Heard from the tomb of ages, points its cold
And solemn finger to the beautiful
And holy visions, that have passed away,
And left no shadow of their loveliness
On the dead waste of life. The specter lifts
The coffin-lid of Hope, and Joy, and Love,
And bending mournfully above the pale,
Sweet forms that slumber there, scatters
Dead flowers
O'er what has passed to nothingness.

The year
Has gone, and with it, many a glorious thought
Of happy dreams. Its mark is on each brow,
Its shadow, in each heart. In its swift course,
It waved its scepter o'er the beautiful;
And they are not. It laid its pallid hand
Upon the strong man; and the haughty form
Is fallen, and the flashing eye is dim.
It trod the hall of revelry, where thronged
The bright and joyous; and the tearful wail
Of stricken ones is heard, where erst the song
And reckless shout resounded. It passed O'er
The battle-plain, where sword and spear,
And shield,
Flashed in the light of mid-day; and the strength
Of serried hosts is shivered, and the grass,
Green from the soil of carnage, waves
Above
The crushed and mouldering skeleton. It came,
And faded like a wreath of mist at eve;
Yet, ere it melted in the viewless air,
It heralded its millions to their home,
In the dim land of dreams.

Remorseless Time!
Fierce spirit of the glass and scythe!
What power
Can stay him in his silent course, or melt
His iron-heart to pity! On, still on,
He presses, and forever. The proud bird,
The condor of the Andes, that can soar
Through heaven's unfathomable depths,
Or brave
The fury of the northern hurricane,
And bathe his plumage in the thunder's home,
Furls his broad wing at night-fall, and Sinks down
To rest upon his mountain crag; but Time
Knows not the weight of sleep or weariness,
And Night's deep darkness has no chain
To bind
His rushing pinion.

Revolutions sweep
O'er earth, like troubled visions o'er the breast
Of dreaming sorrow; cities rise and sink
Like bubbles on the water; fiery isles
Spring blazing from the ocean, and go back
To their mysterious caverns; mountains rear
To heaven their bold and blackened cliffs,
And bow
Their tall heads to the plain; and empires rise,

Gathering the strength of hoary centuries,
And rush down, like the Alpine avalanche,
Startling the nations; and the very stars,
You bright and glorious blazonry of God,
Glitter awhile in their eternal depths,
And, like the Pleiad, loveliest of their train,
Shoot from their glorious spheres, and pass away
To dapple in the trackless void; yet Time,
Time, the tomb-builder, hold his fierce career,
Dark, stern, all pitiless, and pauses not
Amid the mighty wrecks that strew his path,
To sit and muse, like other conquerors,
Upon the fearful ruin he hath wrought.
G. D. PRENTICE.

How Harry Dickson won his Wife.

It is just forty-five years since my education was finished at Mrs. Middleton's seminary for young ladies, the most genteel school in our part of Hampshire, where we learned reading, writing, and needle work, polite behavior, and the country dances. I was seventeen and the eldest of ten children. My father's farm was but a small one, held on lease from our rich neighbor, Farmer Dickson, the principal man of our parish after the squire. He had two farms leased from him besides my father's, and a large one which he tilled himself, kept a retinue of men and maids, did the best plowing, turned out the finest cattle, and made a vast deal of money by his dairy. His wife had died before I was born, and his house was kept in prime order by the youngest of his aunts, Miss Millwood. He had neither son nor daughter but Master Harry, whom everybody thought a sensible, handsome young man, and not half so purse-proud as his father. Being our landlord and next neighbor, he took a great interest in us. He said the family was too large for my father and mother to manage without advice; but providing for them was their chief difficulty; and when they heard that a distant relation of his, Mrs. Williams, of the Golden Sheaf, wanted a well-brought-up girl, not as a servant, but to help in the house-keeping, they thought it might be a good situation for me.

To tell the whole truth, there was another reason for my going. Before I left school Harry Dickson had begun to pay me attentions; not that I encouraged him much, but he would come after me, and it did not please his father. The old man thought his son should look higher than a poor farmer's daughter, and my parents, having a good bit of pride, were just as angry when they come to know of it. My father said he hoped no daughter of his would ever tempt a young man to disobey his father. My mother said she hoped I had more spirit than to wish to marry into a family who did not think us good enough for them. Of course my father and mother were right. I gave Harry back his ring, but it was after a good deal of crying. He swore he would never marry another woman though his father should disinheritor him; and to let Farmer Dickson and the whole country see that we were not so. On trapping his son, it was settled that I should go to Mrs. Williams.

My father went one day to consult her, and when all was agreed he took me and my trunk respectively in the London coach, which then passed through Clatford, our village, and stopped at the Golden Sheaf. For a country inn, the house was large and handsome. It had every convenience of yard and stabling, a good garden, a fine orchard, and some hundred acres of corn and meadow land. It was situated on the high road where Surrey and Hampshire meet. The ground was high, and from its upper window one could see many a mile along the road and over the country. Stage coaches and carriers' wagons stopped there; so did country hunts and traveling gentry, corn and cattle dealers on their way to London, farmers to and from the market towns; and all who came or went spoke well of the good housekeeping, the fair dealing, and the general civility of Mrs. Williams.

She was a tall, thin woman, upright, active, and still handsome, though bordering on sixty. Her black hair was but thinly sprinkled with gray. She had a good deal of the gentlewoman in her manner; always wore a black tabinet gown, a famboured apron, and a cap of Nottingham lace, which was fine enough in those times. But there was something in her look so stern and rigid that it made one careful of one's doings before her. Her story, which we had heard in private from Farmer Dickson, was both sad and singular. She had been brought up in a respectable country inn of the county of Cornwall, and married a rich farmer. He left her early a widow, with an only daughter. She managed the farm well, however, and was a prosperous woman. Her daughter grew up a beautiful girl, and the mother's heart was wrapped up in her; but the son and heir of a neighboring squire induced her to elope with him, and marriage into his high family was not to be thought of. Mrs. Williams was a woman of a high spirit, strict and proud. It was said that the poor girl never dared to let it be known where she lived for fear of her mother, and the squire's son remained abroad. But the old woman would not stand the disgrace; she sold house and farm, left that part of the country, bought the Golden Sheaf, and set herself up where nobody knew her family or history: she had been doing well for many a year.

Stern as she looked, Mrs. Williams was kind to me, and I did my best to please her. There was a good deal of novelty and life to be seen about the inn. I soon got over the parting with my mother and sisters, and was trying hard to think no more of Harry, though I had made up my mind—minds are so easily made up at seventeen—to live unmarried for his sake. Thus the summer wore away, and the harvest passed, and the short dull days of November came on. I had got accustomed to the ways of the house. Though good, it was an old one. There was the best kitchen, and the best parlor opening from it; numbers of pantries, closets, and cupboards; and a stair behind the old dresser, leading right up to Mrs. Williams' own room. It was over the porch, and had windows on three sides, which gave her a view of all who came or went. Her accounts were kept there, in an old fashioned oak desk; so were her choice recipes, and she had them for making everything. There was a cupboard set in the thick wall, its door not to be distinguished from the rest of the wainscot, in which Mrs. Williams kept the most rare and curious other stores. I was once permitted to see them, as a great privilege, for she never trusted the key to any hand but her own. There were spices and essences, costly at the time of my story, and not common yet; old china which had been brought by the first of the East India Company's ships; mixtures for taking out stains; powder for destroying moths; and a poison for rats invented long ago by some of the Cornish people, and of such a terrible nature, that if one rat took it all the rest fled from the place, and never came back. So Mrs. Williams told me; but I won't vouch for it; and can only remember now that the poison resembled nothing I ever saw but red pepper, which was an expensive luxury at that time, and kept in the cupboard also. It may be believed that I was in great favor, for not only were her treasures shown to me, but I had tea with Mrs. Williams in the porch-room every evening. She took kindly to me from the first.

One close, cloudy day, such as comes so often at the Martinmas time, I was sitting in the best kitchen close by the window, doing some needle-work, and Mrs. Williams was up in her room settling the accounts, for it was Monday, and early in the afternoon. The sound of a horse's hoofs on the road made me look out, and there was a gentleman, handsomely mounted, with a servant after him, as gentlemen rode in those days. They looked as if they had traveled far, and were coming to rest at the inn. When the gentleman alighted I saw he was tall and handsome, somewhere about thirty-five, and had a jovial, good-natured look, like one who was well pleased with himself and everything about him. He walked in not at all strange like, and asked me in the most courteous manner if Mrs. Williams lived here, and if he and his servant could have dinner. The first question was asked in a low tone, the second in a louder key; and before I could answer it Mrs. Williams came down. Judging from her look, he was quite a new customer. I thought the gentleman glanced curiously at her at first, and then seeming satisfied that all was right, repeated his question about the dinner, saying he was a stranger in that part of the country, but he had heard so much of the Golden Sheaf that he wished to stop and dine at the house.

I never saw Mrs. Williams receive any gentleman with more respect and ceremony. She courtied him into the best parlor; called the hostlers to help his servant with the horses, took his order for dinner, and set about cooking it herself, for the cook was hard at work making black and white puddings in the buttry. My first notion was that she had discovered him to be some great personage in disguise, and I half expected to be told of it. Mrs. Williams used to talk to me a good deal when we were alone quiet afternoons, but now she went on cooking and making things ready without saying a word, and there was a queer, fixed look in her face which I could not understand, but it kept me from talking. I laid down my work and rose to make the eel-soup; it was one of the things for which the house was famous—a Cornwall dish, I believe; and I had been trusted with the making of it of late, to my great exultation. But now she stopped me. "No, Mary, finish your sewing; those linens will be wanted. I'll make the soup myself."

I sewed away, wondering who the gentleman could be, and what had come over Mrs. Williams, till happening to look up I missed her out of the kitchen. She had gone to her own room, but came back in a minute with a paper in her hand, which she shook into the soup, and then threw into the fire.

"That's the red pepper; it will do now," said she, taking up spoonful, and making-believe to taste it, but she did not. I stood on for a minute or two, though my blood was running cold; and the boiling of that soup in the large quiet kitchen sounds through my head even now. Mrs. Williams was standing at the window with her back to me. I never will know what made me do it, but it was as if somebody had bidden me, and without a word or a thought but that it must be done, I ran to the fire, gave the saucepan a poke, and sent the soup blazing up the chimney. As it fizzed up, the thought of her anger came over me. I knew not what I did, but uttering a wild cry of fear, I rushed to the nearest door, and it was the best parlor. The next thing I remember is crouching behind the gentleman, who had started up and stood in the door, as Mrs. Williams came forward with two knives, which had been lying on the window-sill, in her hand.

"Pooh, never mind the spilling of the soup," said he, understanding at once what I had done, which indeed was easily seen. "You would no be angry with the child for that; she could not help it, I dare say. I can dine very well without it. You don't know me, Mrs. Williams," he continued, coming a step nearer where she stood, still looking at me with a deadly glitter in her eyes.

"Don't!" said she, and I did think she was trying which of the knives was the sharpest. "Well," said the gentleman, "you may know me to be Edward Winstanley; but you don't know that I have married your daughter, and brought her home a lady. I never meant to act the villain by her. We were privately married; but while the old man lived it had to be kept a secret, and we knew you would not keep it. That is why I have come to-day to surprise you; but you will come to Winstanley Park, and give us your blessing. By Jove, ma'am, you are not going to faint?" She had staggered back against the wall, her white lips set, and her eyes growing glassy. He and I, and half a dozen of the servants, whom my scream had brought in, ran to help her; but she pushed us away with a desperate effort, darted up stairs, and we heard her lock herself in her own room. The whole house was terribly frightened; the maids all concluding that Mrs. Williams had seen a ghost. What Mr. Winstanley thought I do not know, but he asked me no questions, and never seemed to suspect anything about the spilled soup. He left a note for Mrs. Williams, and went off with the servant a little before sunset. We all went about our business, for work never slackened in that house on any account, and the evening coach was expected. Just before it came, Mrs. Williams' bell rang, and the housemaid said she wanted me. When I came into the room she was sitting at the desk, looking herself again; but her face was still white, and she had her long knitted purse full of guineas in her hand.

"Mary," said she, "you are a good girl, take this and go home; I'll take care that you get no blame."

"I want no money, ma'am," said I; "but I'll go home if you let me, and never say a word except to my father and mother."

See held out the purse once more, and then pointed to the door, but could say nothing; it must have been a hard pull for her proud spirit, I got out of the room as quick as I could, threw on my hat and cloak, and got into the coach as soon as it came up, leaving trunk and all behind me.

My father and mother were mightily surprised when it set me down at their door in Clatford, just as the clock struck twelve; they were still more astonished when I told them what had brought me home. My father first called me a brave, good girl, and then advised me not to be proud about it, because it was the work of Providence, and we were bound on all hands to keep such a story quiet about Farmer Dickson's relation. The story was kept between me and them; but my homecoming got wind, and Farmer Dickson came in a great flutter to know why Mary had left her good situation. My mother would not have reflections cast on her child, so she told him in the parlor. And what he said I don't know, because the door was fast shut, but he came out rubbing his hands, and clapped me on the back, saying,

"By Jove, you are a fine girl, Mary! and if Harry don't finish that business, I'll ask you to be Mrs. Dickson myself."

I think I have not much more to tell. Harry did finish the business. There were some people in our village that never got over the wonder of it; but I am proud to say the Dickson family did not lose by me, for ten years after, Mrs. Williams died in her own inn, and left her whole property in equal shares between me and her daughter, Lady Winstanley. She had never gone to the Park but once, and then she would neither eat, drink, nor sleep in the house, but saw her daughter and grand-son, now heir of the estate, and then went straight back to the Golden Sheaf. She never took another girl to stay with her; but the maids had a story among them, and they always stuck to it, that I went on account of something terrible which came down the chimney, and frightened Mrs. Williams half out of her senses. They said one thing, however, which I am inclined to think might be true, that she never liked to make eel-soup after, nor cared to look at red pepper.

GREELEY AT CHURCH IN SALT LAKE CITY.—A correspondent of the Syracuse (N. Y.) Standard, writing from Salt Lake City, says:

"We attended the Mormon church this morning. Preaching by Elder Orson Pratt. Horace Greeley was present, and sat inside the railing with the twelve Apostles. Mr. Bernhisel sat on one side, Judge Phelps on the other, and Heber C. Kimball in front. Horace took an exhaustive survey of the female portion of the house, cocked his eye up at the speaker as if he were looking at a giraffe, braced himself against one saint, leaned his head against another and went sound asleep, as if he had been in bed, with his mouth wide open. I never felt so proud of my native land as I did when I saw its able representative treating the whole d—d nonsense with silent contempt, by 'rolling into the arms of Murphy' (Irish quotation from Heaton Mythology.) The singing was decidedly Presbyterian—the orchestra consisting of one small organ and four singers." "An envious man repines as much as the manner in which his friends live as if he maintained them."

[From the St. Louis Bulletin.] A Singular Dream and its Fulfillment.

Mrs. Sally Vance is a respectable widow lady, who resided on Clark avenue, near Fourteenth street. Since her husband's death, about two years, she has supported herself, and three children, by her needle. A portion of the time she struggle against poverty was very severe; but she neither complained nor asked help from her neighbors, thinking that time, which rights all wrongs, would deal mercifully with her. A few evenings since she retired for the night, revolving these thoughts, doubtless, in her mind. Soon she sank into a quiet slumber, such as always visits the hard-working, virtuous man or woman. She dreamed, so she says, that a very nice gentleman, dressed in black, stood at her side, and called her his wife, promised to be a father to her children, and told her he had wealth enough for both of them. The stranger did not look like her dead husband, but appeared somewhat younger and more handsome. Her heart was touched, even in sleep, and she modestly consented to become his bride. Such a feeling of happiness was experienced as she had never felt before, even in the days of her first love. Her heart bounded so much as to suddenly awaken her from that sweet slumber. She started up—looked around—all was dark as a poker. No nice looking man stood there to bless her, with his love and purse. Nothing could be heard in the silent darkness of the room, save the beatings of her fluttering heart, and the soft breathing of her children. It was some time before Mrs. Vance could convince herself that she had been dreaming. Yet such an impression had her dream made upon her mind, that she felt certain it would some time turn out a reality. She sank into slumber again.

The next morning our worthy widow started with a basket on her arm for Lucas market. She arrived there without any mishap, and was making her purchases, when looking around, she saw in the crowd a gentleman dressed in black, the very image of her dream. She started with surprise, turned pale, and fainted. On coming to her senses again, the gentleman in black was standing over her, bathing her forehead with water. She looked up into his face, and there was the same countenance, the same beaming of love from those eyes, that she saw in the one of her dream. Mrs. Vance started up from her swoon, said she felt much better, bought her beef steak, potatoes and cabbage, and was about to return home when the stranger came along, politely bowed, and said, as she was somewhat indisposed, he would esteem it a favor if she would allow him to carry her basket home. She thanked him; said he was very kind, and she should esteem it as a favor if he would do so. We need not say that they had a most agreeable walk to her residence. Mrs. Vance invited him in to take breakfast. The gentleman in black consented. They had a charming breakfast on beef-steak, potatoes, hot cakes and coffee. The gentleman prolonged his stay two hours after breakfast, and we are pleased to say he left with a very exalted notion of the little widow, promising to call again in the evening. He did so. Somehow or other they mutually agreed to get married, and yesterday afternoon Dr. Samuel Fenner of Cincinnati, Ohio, left the city in company with his wife, formerly Mrs. Sally Vance of Clark avenue. They were accompanied by the bride's family, and we predict for the worthy couple a happy life. Dr. Fenner is considerably wealthy. Truly,

"Dreams have oft a meaning hid,
As fancy paints the sleeping lid."

Cincinnati surpasses all other cities in the wide world for making aqua vitae.—During the past year, ending August 1st, 609,940 barrels were exported, (amounting to about 20,000,000 gallons,) and requiring about 7,000,000 bushels of corn—an awful amount of the "critter."

A very diffident young gentleman in one of his experiences, waiting on a maiden home in the evening, desired her not to mention it, as it might cause remarks.

"Don't be afraid," she said, of my telling any one, I feel as much ashamed of it as you do."

PUNNING DISPATCHES.—General Havelock was a wit as well as a warrior. The following is the dispatch by which he conveyed the intelligence of his last success in India to the Governor-General:—

"Dear General:—Let all our past misfortunes be forgotten, for we are in Lucknow. Yours, HAVELOCK."

This is nearly as good as Sir William Napier's dispatch announcing the capture of Seider: "Peccavi. 'I have sinned.'"

"I do not think, madam, that any man of the least sense would approve of your conduct."

"Sir, how can you judge what any man of the least sense would do?"

An old toper, chancing to drink a glass of water for want of anything stronger, snatched his glass and handed it to one of his companions. "Why, it doesn't taste badly. I have no doubt it is wholesome for females and children."

THE VALLEY TAN.

STEPHEN DEWOLFE, Editor.

Wednesday, Jan. 4, 1860.

Our paper this week is only half its usual size. If excuses are necessary for this reduction in its proportions, they can be found in the exhaustion felt in consequence of Christmas and New-Year festivities, and in the utter disinclination, not to say incapacity of turning on a sudden from the pleasures we have experienced, to so dull and common-place an occupation as editing a newspaper. We are anxious, furthermore, to recuperate our health and spirits, if possible, for the first grand hop of the new year, which takes place on Thursday evening next, at the Townsend House. But if our paper is curtailed in size, we can, with confidence, recommend its contents, as far as they go. On our first page will be found a fine poem on "the closing year," by George D. Prentice; and an account of two excellent ladies, who, it is to be hoped, found good husbands also. On our second page is a variety of articles, original and selected, which we hope will be found sufficient to stay the stomachs of our readers till next week, when we expect again to expand to former proportions.

Personal.

We had the pleasure of meeting, yesterday morning, Capt. A. B. Miller, of the firm of Miller, Russell & Co., who arrived the evening previous, direct from Leavenworth City, which place he left on the 13th of December; accomplishing the trip across the Plains in twenty days. The Captain is somewhat bronzed, from the effect of his trip, but looks well otherwise, and is as large as life. He brings no special news in addition to that received by mail a week ago.

Congress had not organized when he left, and the message of the President had consequently not been sent in. In the balloting which had taken place for Speaker of the House of Representatives, Sherman, of Ohio, Republican, received 110; Bocoek, of Virginia, 86; the remainder of the votes, scattering. Sherman was charged with sanctioning, and encouraging the circulation of a work in favor of abolition, written by some man in North Carolina, and this made him more objectionable than he otherwise would have been to the southern members; and a portion of them had declared their intention to withdraw from Congress, in case he was elected.

The excitement aroused by the Harper's Ferry invasion, still continued when Capt. Miller left. Cook and the remainder of the conspirators, would certainly be executed on the 16th ult., according to the terms of the sentence.

We also met, yesterday, "Uncle Billy Rogers," who is just in from Ruby Valley, three hundred and fifty miles west of here. Mr. Rogers was nine days in making the trip from Ruby Valley to this city, and encountered very severe weather on the road. His face and feet were both touched with the frost. Mr Rogers reports that an unusual, if not unprecedented amount of snow had fallen in Ruby Valley. The snow was over two feet deep when he left; and seventeen hundred head of cattle, belonging to the herd of Russell, Majors & Waddell, wintering in the Valley, had perished. Mr Rogers counted eighty head within a few feet of his house.

The loss of such an amount of stock must fall heavily on any one, but probably none are better able to endure it than the firm upon whom it has fallen.

Another Murder.

From private letters, received from Camp Floyd, and from gentlemen from that place, now here, we learn that a man by the name of William Bryan, a private soldier, was murdered in Fairfield, one night last week. He was killed, and his body thrown into one of the holes in the outer skirts of Fairfield, from whence the dirt had been taken to make adobes; and it was late in the afternoon of the following day, before the body was discovered. He was mangled in a horrid manner about the head, showing that most brutal violence had been used by the man committing the crime. A man, familiarly known as "Gus," or "Gust," a German, whose proper name we have not heard, is suspected of having committed the crime. He kept a brewery near the place where the murdered man was found; and acknowledged the killing to some one at the Camp, or in Fairfield, but made his escape before being suspected of having committed the crime. We have further heard that he was seen in this city, on the second evening after the murder; but he has not yet been arrested; and his whereabouts, we presume, is now unknown. After the discovery of their murdered comrade, a portion of the soldiers belonging to his company or regiment, went over in the Fairfield, and began to tear down and destroy the building in which he was supposed to have been killed, but they were restrained from their purpose before it was accomplished. An order has, we learn, been since issued by the commanding officer of the Camp, forbidding the soldiers from going to Fairfield. A strong guard has also been kept stationed around the place at night, to prevent a possible eruption of the troops upon the place.

Death of E. G. Eastman.

The Nashville (Tenn.) papers announce the death, in that city, on the 23d of November, of apoplexy, of E. G. Eastman, Esq., senior editor of the Union and American. Mr. Eastman was one of the oldest editors in that State, and one of the most terse and forcible political writers in the South. His loss is a public one, but falls like a calamity on the Democratic party of his State, particularly since the death of G. G. Poindexter, Associate Editor of the Union and American, who recently fell by the hands of Allen A. Hall, Editor of the News, in consequence of a difficulty growing out of some editorial comments.

CORRECTION.

We copied from the Missouri Republican into our paper last week, a dispatch from Washington City, of the date of November 19th, stating that troops had been ordered to Mexico. This order, as will be seen by a later dispatch given below, was subsequently countermanded. We had but a few moments to look at our exchanges last week previous to our paper's going to press and this later dispatch was not observed till it was too late to correct the error.

Orders Countermanded.

SPECIAL DISPATCH FROM WASHINGTON.

WASHINGTON, November 21.

The Government this morning countermanded all orders for troops to move on Mexico. Nothing is to be done until after the meeting of Congress.

[That body will then be called upon to act, with reference to "indemnity for the past and security for the future," on that frontier.]

The annexed paragraph, in regard to the balloting for Speaker in the House of Representatives, is from the Leavenworth Herald, of Dec. 9th, but the intelligence received from Capt. Miller is later:

Congress.

The House took another vote for Speaker late Thursday evening. Sherman, Rep., stood 107—having gained all of Grow's votes except two; Bocoek, Dem., 88. Boteler, of Va., is off the track, and Gilmer, of S. C., another South American, carries the vote of that wing.

The Democrats do not ballot their full vote by 13; they probably being among the 14 scattering, mentioned in our dispatch, and 2 or 3 absent. The Republicans only lack 6 of their full vote; probably part absentees and part scattering; possibly one or two of the stripe advocating a fusion of Republicans and K. N.'s, are supporting Gilmer. From the vote, it appears the South Americans have rallied their full strength on Gilmer.

The number of votes necessary to a choice is 116. The Republican strength all told, is 113, and they have but 3 to gain to elect their candidates, provided they rally their own men to a full vote.

This they will certainly do before many more ballots are taken. They have the South Americans to work upon, as well as the 14 scattering, from whom to draw the requisite aid, and we look only to a union of the Democrats and South Americans to defeat Sherman. We do not believe the latter will join the Republicans; but if they persist in forcing a minority candidate into the lists, a Republican victory will be the result.

Gen. Scott's Mission to San Juan, and its results.

Our thanks are due to Major Porter, Asst. Adj. Gen. at Camp Floyd, for forwarding to us the annexed slip from the San Francisco Bulletin, in relation to Gen. Scott's mission to the San Juan Island, and his interview and correspondence with Gov. Douglass, in regard to it. Complete files of our California exchanges did not reach us by the last western mail, or the article, or the substance of it, would have appeared in our paper a week ago. The article in the Bulletin, in addition to what we publish below, farther states, that Gen. Harney was quite indignant at the interpretation put on his acts by Gen. Scott, and had made himself somewhat offensive to the Commander-in-chief, by the bluster and tone of his remarks thereat; in consequence of which Gen. Scott would undoubtedly recommend his recall from the command which he now holds, if Gen. Harney did not himself resign in disgust, and return home; which it was thought he probably would do. It is farther said that Gen. Scott will recommend the union of the separate divisions of the army on the Pacific, under the command of a single General. The portion of the Bulletin's article containing these statements was accidentally destroyed before reaching the compositor, or it would be given as published in that paper.

The arrival of Lieut. General Scott yesterday morning from the North, whether he proceeded recently to unravel the tangled snarl in which General Harney had involved our relations with the British Government, has filled the community with anxious curiosity to learn the result of his mission. The fact that he had withdrawn the troops from San Juan Island, we announced some days ago; and the additional fact that he had settled the vexed question, (and Gen. Harney, also,) amicably, was speedily known upon the arrival of the vessel which brought the veteran chieftain. But of the terms of the settlement, the conditions it involves, the military relations which the two governments now occupy towards the disputed territory, and the recommendations which General Scott has made to the Government at Washington, the public are to this hour unenlightened. Notwithstanding the veil of mystery in which military etiquette compels the General and staff to enshroud his movements until he has made his report to the head of the War Department, we are enabled to lay before our readers an interesting statement of the principal and most important facts in connection with the negotiation. These facts, derived from our correspondents at the North, and from military gentlemen with whom we have conversed, we embody for the sake of convenience, into a succinct and connected statement, that the reader may more readily obtain an intelligible idea of what has and what has not been done.

We stated, some days ago, that Gen. Scott, upon arrival at Fort Townsend, took up his quarters on board the U. S. steamer Massachusetts, and dispatched his Aid, Lieut. Col. Lay, to Victoria, to announce his arrival to Gov. Douglas. The following is a copy of the order issued to that officer:

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
U. S. PROPELLER MASSACHUSETTS,
November 8, 1859.

SIR:—The General-in-Chief directs you to proceed by the steamer Northern to Olympia, the seat of Government of Washington Territory, and thence by way of this place to Victoria. Vancouver Island, for the purpose of making communications with respect to which you have orally received his instructions.

You will subsequently rejoin him at False Dunegness Harbor, W. T., or some point in the vicinity.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your ob't servant.

A. B. THOMAS,
Asst. Adj. Gen.

Lieut. Col. G. W. Lay, Aid-de-Camp, Present.

Col. Lay arrived at Victoria on the 27th October, where he was cordially received by Gov. Douglas, who manifested an earnest desire for an amicable settlement of the difficulty pending between the two Governments. He was very earnest and decided, however, in denunciation of Gen. Harney's course, and did not hesitate to express his opinion that the Government of the United States owed to its own dignity the recall of that officer and the absolute and entire disavowal of his act.

Several days were passed in the interchange of correspondence between Gen. Scott and Governor Douglas. Of course this correspondence is a "sealed book" for the present. We learn, however, that while the General was careful to avoid making any diplomatic apology for what had transpired, (an act which performed at all must be by the Government of Washington, and be addressed directly to the Government of England, through its diplomatic representative there,) he fully agreed with Gov. Douglas that Gen. Harney's acts upon San Juan Island were unfriendly in their aspect, and unjustifiable in view of all the circumstances.

At the same time, the General was careful to avoid anything which could be distorted into an admission that our title to San Juan is even of doubtful validity, and to forestall the idea that the disavowal of Harney's conduct was founded upon any doubt of the right of the United States to have troops upon San Juan Island, if thought desirable. This was effected readily by making a distinction between the mere landing of troops and the manner of their landing, and the subsequent acts. The reasons given by Harney for his course—to wit: the necessity of protecting American citizens from threatened British outrage—his raising of works of fortification, posting of a battery therein, and his large reinforcements of the garrison, were all agreed upon without difficulty as unfriendly acts—acts of war, inconsistent with the amicable sentiments and purposes of the Government of the United States, and therefore necessary to be disavowed.

With these sentiments, frankly expressed by Gen. Scott, Gov. Douglas was delighted, of course; and while he took occasion to assert his own conviction that that was a diplomatic question between the two governments, with which the Colonial authorities had nothing to do. These mutual understandings opened the door wide for what followed. Gen. Scott had put matters in such shape that his further action could neither prejudice the American title to San Juan, nor imply that the United States had yielded to menace. We should have stated heretofore, that Gov. Douglas manifested the most friendly and conciliatory disposition; and that he frankly declares that his own course in addressing the colonial Legislature upon the subject of the San Juan question was prompted solely by the conviction that he was compelled to regard General Harney's conduct as an act of war, which he was obliged to defend the Colony against with such means as were at his disposal.

Finally, the correspondence closed, and on the 5th November Colonel Lay returned in the Revenue Cutter Jefferson Davis. Two days later, the Massachusetts, with Gen. Scott on board, proceeded to San Juan, where the following order was issued, and copies of it forwarded to Victoria, as well as to General Harney:

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
U. S. PROPELLER MASSACHUSETTS,
November 6, 1859.

As soon as practicable, Lieut. Col. Casey, or other Commanding officer on the island of San Juan, will proceed to send therefrom all the companies under his orders except Capt. Pickett's, to the posts to which they had previously belonged, viz: Co. 1 of the 4th Infantry, to Fort Townsend; Companies A and C of the 4th and 9th Infantry, to Fort St. James; and last, the companies of the 2d Artillery to Fort Vancouver. Capt. Pickett and company, and Asst. Surgeon Craig, will remain on the island till further orders, for the protection of the American settlers under his instructions. Lieut. Col. Casey will cause the heavy guns on the island to be re-placed aboard of the propeller, and will send the light battery to Fort Townsend and Stellaquam. By command of

S. THOMAS, Asst. Adjutant General.

It will be seen that the above order directed the withdrawal of all the American troops upon the island, with the exception of Captain Pickett's company of Infantry. The guns withdrawn were designed for the earth works which were in progress of construction under Harney's orders. These works were ordered to be discontinued at once. It was found, after the issuance of the foregoing order, that there was a feeling of dissatisfaction still upon the part of the British authorities because of the maintenance of Pickett's company, which, as the company whose presence gave rise to the difficulty, was especially offensive, particularly as its retention seemed to imply a persistence in the motive actuating Harney in posting them on the island. General Scott, becoming aware of his sensitiveness, promptly removed the cause, by another order withdrawing all the troops, (including Captain Pickett's company,) except Captain Hunt's Company C, of the 4th Infantry. This order was as follows:

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,
U. S. PROPELLER MASSACHUSETTS,
November 8, 1859.

Special Order: As soon as practicable, Lieut. Asst. Colonel Casey, or other commanding officer on the island of San Juan, will cause to proceed therefrom all the companies under his orders, except Capt. Hunt's to the posts to which they had previously belonged, viz: Company 1 of the 4th Infantry, to Fort Townsend; Companies A and C of the 4th and 9th Infantry, to Fort St. James; and last, the companies of the 2d Artillery to Fort Vancouver.

Arrival and Departure of General Scott.

Lieutenant General Winfield Scott arrived in this city on the steamer North-amer yesterday morning about 6 o'clock. As is well known, he came to this country for purposes connected with the San Juan Island difficulty, and arrived about three weeks ago. He proceeded at once to the North, and has been engaged as the Commissioner on the part of the United States up to the time of his departure. It was his intention, on returning to this city, to make at least a short stay; but, upon his arrival, he found it to be his duty to proceed at once to Washington, and, with the promptness characteristic of the man, is now on his way over the ocean again.

On his arrival yesterday, he was conducted by friends (as he declined a public reception) at once to the Oriental Hotel, where he took up his old quarters. He attended Trinity Episcopal Church yesterday morning, but during the rest of the day remained in his quarters, and very few persons were admitted.

He departed on the steamer John L. Stephens this morning, at about 11 o'clock. He again declined an escort, and was accompanied only by his aid, and officer Bliz as orderly. But when on the steamer, and just previous to the departure, a fine compliment was paid the veteran by the gallant old First California Guard, Lieut. J. F. Curtis, commanding. There were two detachments of this company, having two guns kindly loaned by General Clark, and accompanied by the fine band of the Third U. S. Artillery. The company, in full uniform, ranged themselves at the end of the wharf, opposite the after part of the steamer, where the veteran stood, who, upon seeing them, uncovered. The Lieutenant General's salute of fifteen guns was given in fine style, during the first part of which the General stood uncovered, and afterwards saluted in the military style with the hand. In the meanwhile, the band—one of the finest in the country—played the heart-stirring strains of Auld Lang Syne. The effect of this was thrilling, and over the vast crowd which was present, there was to be seen the effects of no ordinary impression. A chord was touched which responded harmoniously to the music and the occasion of parting.

The General has borne the fatigues of his visit to the western world with a manly spirit, and looks as hale and hearty as ever. He was pleased with the northern countries, and carries back with him none but pleasant recollections of California. May the spirit of Peace go with him.

The Beautiful Snow.

The snow, the beautiful snow,
Covering the sky and earth below;
Over the house-tops, over the street,
Over the heads of the people you meet,
Dancing,
Flitting,
Skimming along,
The beautiful snow! it is doing nothing wrong,
It is giving to the world a fair day's work,
It is giving to the world a frolicsome freak,
It is giving to the world a beautiful snow from the heaven above,
Pure as an angel, gentle as love!

How the snow, the beautiful snow,
Flakes the flakes gather and laugh as they go!
Whirling about in its maddening fun,
It plays in its glee with every one,
Chasing,
Laughing,
Hurrying by.

It lights up the face, and sparkles the eye,
And even the dogs, with a bark and a cry,
Cap at the crystals that eddy around,
The town is alive, and its heart in a glow,
To welcome the coming of beautiful snow.

How the wild crowd goes swaying along,
Hailing each other with humor and song,
How the gay sledges, like meteors, flash by,
Bright for the moment, then lost to the eye;
Ringing,
Swinging,
Dashing they go.

Over the crust of the beautiful snow;
So pure when it falls from the sky,
To be trampled in the mud by the crowd
Rushing by,
To be trampled and tracked by the thousand feet,
To be blended with the filth in the horrible street.

COLDSTREAM.

A large party is assembled to celebrate the feast of St. Partridge at Ravelstoke Hall, an old country house about two miles distant from the north-west coast of Devon. The various branches of English society are very fairly represented by its component parts. There are two peers, three members of the lower house, some gaudy men, some under-graduates, a clergyman, and a lieutenant in the navy. But our hero is not a representative man; yet he belongs to a class which, called into existence by the accumulated wealth of the nineteenth century, is ever on the increase.

Frederick Tyrawley resembles Sir Charles Coldstream, inasmuch as he has been everywhere and done everything; but he is by no means as good as his name, and can still take an interest in whatever his hand finds to do. Nor is his everything everybody else's everything. It is not bounded by Jerusalem and pyramids.

Mr. Tyrawley has fought in more than one State of South America, and has wandered for more than two years from isle to isle of the Pacific. A mysterious reputation hovers round him. He is supposed to have done many things, but no one is very clear what they are; and it is not likely that much information on the point will be obtained from him, for he seldom talks much, and never speaks of himself. His present mission appears to be to kill partridges, play cricket, and dress himself. Not that it must be supposed that he has ever been in the habit of wearing less clothing than the custom of country in which he may have been located required; but only that at the present time he devoted much attention to buff waistcoats and gauze neck-ties, braided coats, and curled mustaches.

Such as he is, however, he is an object of interest to the feminine portion of the party at Ravelstoke Hall, for he is rich and handsome, as well as mysterious, and he cannot be more than two-and-thirty. And the ladies at Ravelstoke outnumber the men; for although it is still rare for the fair sex to participate actively in the saturnalia of the partridge-god, they will always be found hovering in considerable numbers on the outskirts of the feast: and the varieties of the British lady are fairly represented.

There are some mammas with daughters to marry, and there are some daughters with a mamma to prevent marrying again, which is, perhaps, the most difficult thing of the two, as she has an income in her own right. There are blondes and brunettes, and pretty, brown-haired, brown-eyed girls who hover between the two orders, and combine the most dangerous characteristics of both, who can wear both blue and pink, and who look prettier in the one color than they do in the other; but who always command your suffrage in favor of that which they are wearing when you look at them.

And there is Constance Baynton with gray eyes and black hair. And the nicest critic of feminine appearance might be defied to state what she had worn, half an hour after he left her; for no one can ever look at anything except her face.

Yet Constance is three-and-twenty, and still unmarried. Alas, what coward men are! The fact is that Constance is very clever; but as Mrs. Mellish (the widow) says, "not clever enough to hide it."

Is she a little vexed at her present condition? certainly she does not exhibit any tendency to carry out Mrs. Mellish's suggestion, if it has ever been repeated to her. The young men are more afraid of her than ever; and certainly she does say very sharp things, sometimes. Especially she is severe upon idlers, the butterflies of fashionable existence. She appears to consider that she has a special mission to arouse them; but they do not appear to like being lectured. With the young ladies she is a great favorite, for she is very affectionate; and though so beautiful and distinguished, she has proved herself to be not so dangerous a rival as might have been expected. Indeed, it has happened, more than once, that male admiration, rebounding from the hard surface of her manner, has found more yielding metal in the bosoms of her particular friends. Besides, she is always ready to lead the van in the general attack upon the male sex, when the ladies retire to the drawing-room.

Not that she ever says anything behind their backs she would not be ready to repeat to their faces; but in that course probably she would not meet with such general support.

In Mr. Tyrawley she affected to disbelieve. She stated as her opinion to her intimate friends, that she did not believe he ever had done, or ever would, anything worth doing; but that he plumed himself on a cheap reputation, which, as all were ignorant of its foundation, no one could possibly impugn.

There is reason to believe that in this instance Miss Constance was not as conscientious as usual; but that she really entertained a higher opinion of the gentleman than she chose to confess. He certainly was not afraid of her, and had even dared to contradict her favorite theory of the general worthlessness of English gentlemen of the 19th century. It was one wet morning when she had been reading Scott to three or four of her particular friends—and it must be confessed that she read remarkably well—that she began to lament the decline of chivalry. Tyrawley was sitting half in and half out of range. Perhaps she talked a little at him. At any rate he chose to accept the challenge.

"I cannot agree with you, Miss Baynton," he said. "It is true we no longer wear ladies' gloves in our helmets, nor do we compel harmless individuals, who possibly may have sweethearts of their own, to admit the superiority of our lady love at the point of the lance; but of all that was good in chivalry, of courage, truth, honor, enterprise, self-sacrifice, you will find as much in the nineteenth century as in the twelfth."

He brightened up as he spoke, and it was quite evident that he believed what he said, a circumstance which always gives an advantage to a disputant. More than one pair of bright eyes smiled approval, and Miss Constance saw a probability of a defection from her ranks. She changed her tactics. "You are too moderate in your claims for your contemporaries, Mr. Tyrawley. If I remember right, modesty has always been considered a qualification of a true knight."

"I am not ashamed to speak the truth," he replied; "your theory would have been more tenable before the days of the Crimean war and the Indian mutiny; but the men who lit their cigars in the trenches of the Redan, and who carried the gate of Delhi, may bear comparison with Bayard, or Cœur de Lion."

"Oh! I do not allude to our soldiers," said she, "of course, I know they are brave; but—here she hesitated a moment, till possibly piqued because her usual success had not attended her in the passage of arms, she concluded,—but to our idle gentlemen, who seem to have no heart for anything."

Tyrawley smiled. "Possibly you may judge too much by the outside," he said. "I am inclined to fancy that some of those whom you are pleased to call idle gentlemen would be found to have heart enough for anything that honor, or duty, or even chivalry, could find for them to do."

"I hope you are right," said Miss Constance, with a slightly perceptible curl of her upper lip, which implied that she did not think so.

Tyrawley bowed, and the conversation, terminated a few minutes afterwards, when he had left the room, the conversation of the young ladies was interrupted by Master George Baynton, aged fourteen, who suddenly attacked his sister.

"I think you are wrong, you know, when you call Tyrawley a humbug."

"My dear," said Constance, with a start, "I never said anything so

"Well, you implied it, you know, in your girl's words, and I think you make a mistake; for he can shoot like one o'clock, never misses a thing, and I hear he can ride no end. He was rather out of practice in his cricket when he came down; but he is improving every day. You should have seen the hit he made yesterday—right up to the cedars."

"Do you think there is nothing else for a man to do, but ride, and shoot, and play cricket?"

"Oh! that's all very well, but you should hear what Merton, our second master says; and a great brick he is, too. 'Whatever you do, do it as well as you can, whether it's cricket or verses.' And I believe if Tyrawley had to fight, he'd go in and win, and no mistake."

"Ah!" said Constance, with a sigh, "he has evidently—what is it you boys call it?—tipped you. Isn't it?"

Indignant at this insult, George walked off to find his friend, and have a lesson in billiards.

The day lingered on, after the usual fashion of wet days in September, in full country houses. There was a little dancing after dinner; but all retired in hopes of a finer day on the morrow.

Tyrawley had some letters to write, so that it was past two before he thought of going to bed. He always slept with his window open, and as he threw up the sash, a fierce gust of wind blew out his candle, and blue down the looking-glass.

"Pleasant, by Jove!" he soliloquized. "I wonder whether it's smashed—unlucky to break a looking-glass!—I'm hanged if I know where the matches are; never mind, I can find my way to bed in the dark."

What a night, as a flash of lightning illumined the room for a moment, and he bent out of the window. "The wind must be about north-west. Cheerful for anything coming up to Bristol from the southward. I wonder what a storm is like on this coast. I have a great mind to go and see. I shall never be able to get that hall-door open without waking them up; what a nuisance. Stay, capital idea! I'll go by the window."

Before starting upon his expedition, he changed the remains of his evening dress (for he had been writing in his dressing-gown) for a flannel shirt and trousers, while a short pea-jacket and glazed hat completed his array. His room was on the first floor, and he had intended to drop from the window-sill; but the branch of an elm came so near, he found that unnecessary, as springing to it he was on the ground, like a cat, in an instant. He soon found his way across the country "like a bird," to the edge of the cliff. The sea for miles seemed one sheet of foam.

But a flash of lightning discovered a group of figures about a quarter of a mile distant, and he distinguished shouts in the intervals of the storm. He was soon among them, and he found that all eyes were turned on a vessel which had struck on a rock within two hundred yards of the cliff. It was evident that she would go to pieces under their very eyes.

"Is there no way of opening communication with her?" he asked of an old coast-guard man.

"Why, ye see, sir, we have sent to Bilford for Mauby's rockets; but she must break up before they come."

"How far is it to Bilford?"

"Better than seven mile, your honor."

"If we could get a rope to them, we might save the crew."

"Every one of them, your honor; but it ain't possible."

"I think a man might swim out."

"The first wave would dash him to pieces against the cliff."

"What depth of water below?"

"The cliff goes down like a wall, forty fathom, at least."

"The deeper the better. What distance to the water?"

"A good fifty feet."

"Well, I have dived off the main yard of the Chesapeake. Now listen to me. Have you got some light, strong rope?"

"As much as you like."

"Well, take a double coil round my chest, and do you take care to pay it out fast enough as I draw upon it."

"You won't draw much after the first plunge; it will be the same thing as suicide, every bit."

"Well, we shall see. There's no time to be lost, lend me a knife."

And in an instant he whipped off his hat, boots, and pea-jacket, then with the knife he cut off its sleeves and passed the rope through them, that it might chafe him less.

The eyes of the old boatman brightened. There was evidently a method in his madness. "You are a very good swimmer, I suppose, sir?"

"I have dived through the surf at Nukuheva a few times."

"I never knew a white man that could do that."

Tyrawley smiled. "But whatever you do," he said, "mind and let me have plenty of rope. Now out of the way, my friends, and let me have a clear start."

He walked slowly to the edge of the cliff, looked over to see how much the rock shelved outwards; then returned, looked to see that there was plenty of rope to carry him out, then took a short run, and leaped as if from the spring-board of a plunging-bath. He touched the water full five-and-twenty feet from the edge of the cliff. Down into its dark depth he went, like a plummet, but soon to rise again. As he reached the surface he saw the crest of a mighty wave a few yards in front of him—the wave that he had been told was to dash him lifeless against the cliff. But now his old experience of the Pacific stands him in good stead. For two moments he draws breath, then, ere it reaches him, he dives below its center. The water dashes against the cliff, but the swimmer rises far beyond it. A faint cheer rises from the shore as they feel him draw upon the rope. The waves follow in succession, and he dives again and again, rising like an otter to take breath, making very steadily onward, though more below the water than above it.

We must now turn to the ship. The waves have made a clean breach over her bows. The crew are crowded upon the stern. They hold on to the bulwarks, and await the end, for no boat can live in such a sea. Suddenly she's hauled from the waters. "Ship a-hoy!" shouts a loud, clear voice, which makes itself heard above the storm. "Throw me a rope or a buoy!" The life-buoy was still hanging in its accustomed place by the mainmast. The captain almost mechanically takes it down, and with well-directed aim throws it within a yard or two of the swimmer. In a moment it is under his arms, and in half a minute he is on board.

"Come on board, sir," he says to the captain, putting one of his wet curls professionally. The captain appeared to be regarding him as a visitor from the lower world; so, turning to the crew, he lifted up the rope he had brought from the shore. Then for the first time the object of his mission flashed upon their minds, and a desperate cheer broke forth from all hands, instantly re-echoed from the shore. Then a strong cable is attached to the small rope and drawn on board—then a second—and the communication is complete. But no time is to be lost; for the stern shows signs of breaking up, and there is a lady passenger. While the captain is planning a sort of chair in which she might be moved, Tyrawley lifts her up on his left arm, steadies himself with his right by the upper rope, and walks along the lower as if he had been a dancer. He is the first on shore, for no sailor would leave till the lady was safe. But they soon follow, and in five minutes the ship is clear—five minutes more, and no trace of her is left.

Ravelstoke Hall has been aroused by the news of the wreck, and Mr. Ravelstoke has just arrived with brandy and blankets. Him, Tyrawley aroids; and, thinking he can be of no further service, he betakes himself across the country once more, and by the aid of the friendly elm regains his chamber without observation. The lady, whom Tyrawley had deposited in a cottage, with a strong recommendation that she should go to sleep immediately, was soon carried off in triumph by Mr. Ravelstoke to the Hall, and welcomed by Lady Grace at half-past three in the morning. There were very few of the guests who slept undisturbed that night. The unusual noise in the house aroused every body, and many excursions were made in unfinished costume to endeavor to ascertain what was going on. The excitement culminated when the miscellaneous assemblage who had conducted the captain and some of the crew to the Hall, after being well supplied with ale and stronger liquors, conceived that it would be the correct thing to give three cheers at the hour of half-past five.

It was then that Lord Todmorton, an Irish peer, laboring under an erroneous impression that the house was attacked, was discovered on the landing-place, in array consisting principally of a short dressing-gown, flannel waistcoat, and a fowling-piece. Breakfast that morning was a desultory meal. People finished, and talked about the wreck, and began again. It seemed quite impossible to obtain anything like an accurate account of what had taken place. At last the captain appeared, and though almost overwhelmed by the multiplicity of questions, nevertheless between the intervals of broiled ham and coffee, he managed to elucidate matters a little.

Then came the question, Who was it who swam out to the vessel. Tyrawley had only been at Ravelstoke a few days, and was a stranger in the neighborhood. None of the servants had reached the coast till it was all over, so there had been no one to recognize him.

"I scarcely saw him," said the captain, "but he was a dark, tallish man, with a great deal of beard."

"Was he a gentleman?" asked Miss Constance Baynton, who had been taking a deep interest in the whole affair.

"Well, d'ye see, Miss, I can't exactly say, for he hadn't much on; but if he isn't, he'd make a good one, that I'll go bail for. He's the coolest hand I ever saw. Stay, now I think of it, I shouldn't wonder if he was a naval man, for he pulled his fore-lock, half laughing-like, and said, 'Come on board, sir,' to me, when we pulled him up."

"Perhaps it was Rutherford," said Mr. Ravelstoke, naming the lieutenant in the navy, "he is tall and dark."

"And he has been letting his mustache grow since he came on shore," observed a young lady.

"Where is he?"

But Mr. Rutherford was gone down to the cliff to inspect the scene of the disaster.

"Begging your pardon, sir," said the butler, "it could not have been any gentleman stepping in the house, for the door was fastened till the people came down to tell you of the wreck."

At this moment—half past ten a.m.—Mr. Tyrawley walked into the breakfast room. He was got up, if possible, more elaborately than usual.

"Now, here's a gentleman, captain, Mr. Tyrawley, who has been all over the world, and met with some strange adventures. I'll be bound he never saw anything to equal the affair of last night."

"You'd a nearish thing of it, captain?" inquired Tyrawley, speaking very slowly. His manner and appearance quite disarmed any suspicion the captain might have had of his identity.

"Five minutes more, sir, and Davy Jones's locker might have held us all. Begging your pardon, Miss," apologizing to Constance.

The captain had already repeated the story a reasonable number of times, and was anxious to finish his breakfast. So Miss Constance gave it all for the benefit of Mr. Tyrawley, dressed in her own glowing periods.

Tyrawley made no observation upon her recital, but took a third egg.

"Well, Mr. Tyrawley," said she at last, "what do you think of the man who swam out to the wreck?"

"Why, I think, Miss Baynton—I think," said he, hesitating, "that he must have got very wet. And I sincerely hope he won't catch cold."

There was a general laugh at this, in which the captain joined; but it is to be feared that Miss Constance stamped her pretty little foot under the table.

Tyrawley turned, and began to talk to Miss Mellish, who was sitting on his right.

As he was speaking the door on his left opened, and Lady Grace Ravelstoke entered with the lady passenger. The lady heard him speak, and there are some voices which a woman never forgets, and the dangerous journey over the rope had not passed in silence.

She laid her hand upon his arm, and said, "Oh, sir, how can I thank you?"

Tyrawley rose as in duty bound, saying, "Do not speak of it, I did not know when I came off, that I was to have the pleasure of assisting you."

But the astonishment of the captain was beautiful to behold.

"Why you don't mean to say—Well, I never; dash my wig—well I'm—Here, shake hands sir, will you?" And he stretched across the table a brawny hand, not much smaller than a shoulder of mutton.

The grip with which Tyrawley met his, seemed to do a great deal more to convince him of his identity, than the lady's recognition of their preserver.

The day was as wet as the preceding. Half-an-hour after breakfast, Mr. Tyrawley lounged into the back drawing-room. There sat Miss Constance Baynton, and, by the singular coincidence which favors lovers or historians, she sat alone.

Now Constance had made up her mind that she was bound to apologize to Mr. Tyrawley for her rude speeches of yesterday; she had also decided that she would compliment him on his gallant conduct.

She had, in fact, arranged a neat, quiet, cold, formal, appropriate form of words in which she would give her views expression. And how do you think she delivered them? She got up and said, "O Mr. Tyrawley!" and burst into tears.

If a proud woman's pride is a shield to thee, O man, as well as to her, against the arrows of love, remember, that if ever she throws it away—after she has compelled you to acknowledge its value—you are both left utterly defenseless.

Frederick Tyrawley capitulated at once. They are to be married this month. And if Mr. Tyrawley does not, at some future time, achieve a reputation which no mystery shall cloud, it will not be Mrs. Tyrawley's fault.

Social Life in Utah.

There is no better standard of judging concerning the merits of any system of morals or religion, recommended to the world for adoption, than to observe its effects upon the lives and manners of those who profess to be governed by it. This is the standard established, indeed, by the Scripture itself, which declares that, "by their fruits ye shall know them;" "a good tree cannot bring forth corrupt fruit; neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit." Now, it is true that, in every sect and denomination that has ever risen, had men and hypocrites, who would bring disgrace on any cause with which they were connected, have contrived to creep in. It would be unfair, of course, to judge any system by such adherents as these. The best standards should always be taken as exponents, for these may fairly be presumed to illustrate the merits, as well as the defects of whatever they profess. A profound writer and philosopher has said that no religion could be a bad one that elevated the mental and moral faculties of our natures. If this proposition is true, its converse must likewise be true, that no religion can be a good one that lowers in man the standard of excellence in the qualities named.

Now if the Mormon religion be judged by the standard laid down, and which is universally applied to other sects and denominations, it will not, we think, be found in any respect superior to many others that can be named, while in more particulars than one, we think its inferiority to them must be apparent to all. We lay aside for the present, the grave and horrid crimes which have been so often charged upon the people of this Territory, and which is believed to be a part of the polity of the peculiar religion which they profess, and look into the daily and ordinary habits and the social life of those professing the Mormon religion, and who are esteemed by themselves as well as the world outside, as "burning and shining lights."

In the adopted faith. Do we find among these greater circumspection of conduct—more elevated aims of action, or a more conscientious adherence to principle and duty, than we do in those making no professions of a saintly character; or do we find them exhibiting constantly the same propensities of appetite and passion, the same weaknesses and sins that characterize the unconverted world? Now, a religion that brings no reformation in heart or life, or that in no way restrains men in the commission of wrong, must be, in some way, defective, for these are the chief aims and objects of religion, as far as this world is concerned. What, then, will be thought of a system which tolerates, or passes over profanity, intemperance, and dozens of other kindred vices, in those professing it? What, among any denomination of Christians, would be thought of the humblest among the laity, who was found guilty of conduct like this? Would he not be instantly lopped off from an association which he dishonored by his conduct? How much more respectable, then, does such conduct become, when practised by those who occupy exalted positions in the Church. Yet we have known men here, enjoying the high sounding and sanctified title of "Bishop," who, perchance, have been called "provident and fatherly Bishops," who indulged in exactly such offenses as we have named. We have heard of persons being cut off from the Mormon church because of their association with gentiles, but never for the commission of immoralities, while they professed faith in the Mormon creed, and yielded obedience to Mormon authorities. We are not sure, indeed, that the Mormon creed enjoins anything farther than what is embraced in the two latter requirements. We used sometimes to attend the services at the Tabernacle, and we seldom ever heard anything said but what might be resolved into one or the other of these propositions, when the discourse did not consist of a tirade against "gentiles."

The authenticity and divinity of the Book of Mormon, the prerogatives of the priesthood, and the duty of the members to obey the revelations which they profess to give, are the leading themes for pulpit discourses; while the great lessons of judgment, mercy and truth—of repentance towards God, and faith in Jesus Christ, are either ignored or passed over. But we are not preachers ourselves, and we turn, therefore, from the aims and short comings of the Mormons, to notice some features in their social life.

It is a well known fact, we presume, everywhere throughout the country, that gentiles are sedulously excluded from companionship or social intercourse with the families of all good saints residing in the valleys. As we have before remarked, there is nothing that so soon makes a Mormon loose cast with his brethren, or which is more severely reprobated by the church authorities, than the permission of a gentile to associate on terms of any kind of intimacy or friendship with his family. Such a thing as a gentile associating with Mormons here, is quite unknown, and unheard of; and the motive for the exclusiveness which exists, is apparent to all. It is the natural result of the system under which they live, and without which it could not exist. The necessities for it, is known as well in Constantinople, as in Salt Lake City, and leads the Sultan there to post a sentry at the entrance of his Harem, to keep off all intruders. High walls serve here the purpose of sentinels, though we have heard that the latter were sometimes employed. The Mormon Authorities know full well that if their wives and families are permitted to mingle and associate with the outward world, they will soon gain a knowledge of their position, and of the respect and attention which woman elsewhere commands, their knowledge, they know, will lead to dissatisfaction, and dissatisfaction will end in revolt.

It is not strange therefore, that gentiles are forbidden access where so much harm might result from their presence and association. But there are other characteristics of Mormon society, of which we have lately heard, which certainly do appear strange and extremely inconsistent with Mormon professions. The system of polygamy which they practice, and which they try to uphold by the sanctions of religion and revelation, must, it appears to us, be revolting under any circumstances to the refined tastes and instincts of woman, but when a marked distinction is made public between the first wife and those who afterwards share with her the affections of the same noble and capacious heart, it is incomprehensible to us, how any woman can be brought to submit to the injustice and indignity which is done her. We have often heard that the second and subsequent wives, were treated at home more like servants, than with the respect and consideration which is due to a wife; but not till recently, were we informed that they were debarred from attending the most select gatherings which take place among the Mormons themselves, but we are apprised that it is really the case, and that at one or more of the select private parties, that have been held among the upper-tendons of Mormondom, (for Mormondom has its aristocracy like other places) during the present winter, none but the first wife has accompanied her lord to the select assemblage. If this is true, (and we have heard it from a source deemed reliable,) we repeat again, that it is remarkable to us how any woman can endure so marked and palpable an affront to her position, and so gross an insult to her as a wife, without at once and forever severing a relationship that permits it.

And what will be thought of a man—a man! Heaven save the mark of a man—a creature so low as to be willing, to enter a social circle from which a being to whom he is wedded, and who he calls his wife, is not regarded as a suitable person to accompany him. We turn from the inquiry as we do from those to whom it refers, with disgust, and quit the subject.

The weather for two weeks past has been extremely mild and pleasant, for the season of the year. The sleighing has also been fine for several days past, and if we may judge from the merry "ringing and jingling, of the bells," and the number of sleighs that are constantly gliding to and fro through the streets of the city, the opportunity for this most delightful recreation is being well improved. Everybody seems to be in perfect glee, and the city presents almost the gaiety of a carnival. Even we, with all the soberness and circumspection that belongs to us, could not escape the general contagion for enjoyment and fun, which has possessed every one else, and last night we reenacted the feat we performed some time ago, of taking a ride by the side of a live bunch of calico, duly expanded by hoops and crinoline, (we guess at the last,) but we know that we enjoyed ourselves hugely.

The Crisis on the Slavery Question.—Starting Southern Programme of Protection or Dissolution.

We are standing upon the threshold of the most momentous events in the history of the civilized world. For good or evil, for a renewal of the bonds of peace and harmony between the North and the South, or a violent rupture, we are entering upon a new order of things. The late desperate and bloody abolition invasion of Virginia, its extensive ramifications, the widespread sympathy betrayed throughout the North for that wretched traitor, cutthroat and horse thief, Old Brown, (who pays to-day the penalty of his black and manifold crimes,) and all the elements of this black republican war of subjugation against the South have brought our political affairs to a crisis. It must be met. The leading minds of the South are moving to meet it. Read our latest advices from Washington.

The Southern plan of operations thus disclosed comprehends, in the first place, a law of Congress for the protection of the institution of slavery in the slave States against abolition incursions, abolition incendiaries, and abolition interference with Southern institutions, destroying, or calculated to endanger, the lives and property of our Southern brethren. This law, the South will doubtless demand, shall embrace a practical enforcement of the object of the Fugitive Slave law, and such pains and penalties against all traitorous encroachments upon Southern rights as may be deemed necessary for the protection of slavery and the security of the people of the slave States.

And why not? The constitution of the United States fully recognizes and amply provides for the security of the institution of slavery. When the constitution was formed all the States, we believe, were practically slave States, with the single exception of Massachusetts, where the soil and climate had proved by experiment that slavery "could not be made to pay." The recognition prospectively of the African slave trade to the year 1808, the allowance of a count three-fifths of the slave population in the federal ratio for Congress, the provision for the recapture of fugitive slaves, and the paramount recognition of the equality of the several States as members of the general confederacy, were the ground-work of the constitution. We of the North are bound by this compact and all its concessions and compromises; and when they have ceased to afford that protection to the Southern States which rightfully they may claim, does it not become the duty of Congress to provide that protection under the constitution which the laws as they stand, local and federal, have failed to secure? There can be but one answer to this question.

Such, then, being the protection which the South may and will demand of this Congress, the question recurs, will it be granted? We think not. The thing is impossible in the present House of Representatives, of men pledged to legislate against slavery, and of men of the Douglas school, pledged to Congressional non-interference. Anticipating the inevitable result, then, it appears, in the second place, that in failing to secure any measures of protection from Congress, this Southern plan of operations contemplates the withdrawal of the Southern members from Congress, and a meeting of them at Richmond, or some other convenient locality, to consider the ways and means demanded for the security of Southern institutions in an independent Southern confederacy. And what then?

While the Southern seceders from Congress are shaping out their measures for the general movement on the part of the Southern States for independence, embracing the organization of a military establishment, and overtures of commercial reciprocities to the Western Powers of Europe, it is probable that a quorum sufficient for business purposes will still be left in each house of Congress. We may safely conclude, too, that thus being left to their own pleasure, and without serious opposition, the republican party will adopt strong measures for the coercion of the rebellious South into submissive measures calculated to precipitate rather than avert an "irrepressible conflict." And so, it is possible that the close of our impending Presidential campaign may be the beginning of a civil war between the federal government and the Southern States.

Such are the contingencies foreshadowed in this Southern programme of protection or independence—of security within the Union, or a separate government. And when we consider the important fact that the expenses of the Union are chiefly extracted from the South, while the benefits and profits of the Union are chiefly pocketed by the North, we find a very significant meaning in this allusion to Southern reciprocal commercial treaties with England, France and all other commercial foreign Powers. The Southern States, to, as an independent confederacy, could extort from the North any amount of protection to their slave property upon a commercial basis. This idea, at all events, has taken a deep hold upon the Southern mind; so that we must henceforth remember that disunion has ceased to be a Southern scarecrow, and has become a term full of Southern advantages.

And how stand we at the North in view of this programme of disunion? The solid North, excepting the imperial and conservative city of New York, stands arrayed against the South and threatening her subjugation. Everywhere we find the Democratic party called upon to ratify a degrading submission to the black republican balance of power, in a recognition of the abolition heretics of the Buffalo platform. This may be regarded as but a straw upon the great stream of our national affairs; but it is a straw which marks the drift of the tide. In revolutionary times a straw or a feather may turn the scales; and, in view of the critical movements we have detailed, we are now on the very verge of a terrible revolution.

The barber who dressed the head of a barrell, has been engaged to fix up the locks of a canal.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 1, 1859. We are approaching a crisis in our political affairs, which may possibly bring this Union to a speedy dissolution. While all the small-beer politicians and spoilsmen at Washington are debating, plotting and counterplotting for the offices and spoils of the House organization, you may depend upon it that the leading men of the South are brooding upon a far more important matter. The paramount question with them, is, are we and our institutions any longer secure in this Union? and if not secure, what steps shall we take for our security?

Acting upon this idea, I understand that the following programme has been substantially agreed upon by a number of leading Southern men, in Congress and out of Congress, to wit:—

First.—That in view of the Harper's Ferry abolition invasion, and its extensive and alarming ramifications; and in view of the sympathies of the abolitionized republican party for old Brown, and of the threats of that party to reduce the South to submission, a special law shall be demanded of Congress for the future protection and security of the Southern States against all abolition conspirators, emissaries and incendiaries.

Second.—That in default of some such Congressional protection, the Southern members of both houses shall withdraw from Washington, and meet in a body at Richmond, Virginia, or some other convenient place, in view of the initial steps for an independent Southern confederacy.

In anticipation of this alternative, I am further advised that this Southern Congressional meeting, in Richmond or elsewhere, will proceed to put the South in a proper position before the great Western Powers of Europe, including a programme of commercial treaties on a purely Southern basis, that can hardly fail to attract the sympathies of even England for Southern cotton, including Southern slavery.

Confronted by this contemplated Southern plan of operations, how utterly insignificant the House organization, the Charleston Convention, and all other political schemes and movements appear, in reference to 1860. If a Southern demand for Congressional protection of the institution of slavery shall be made—and it will be made—and if this protection shall be refused, as it will be refused by the anti-slavery Northern majority of the House, then we may witness before the close of this session of Congress the opening of the last chapter of the great American Union. Rely upon it, that if the Southern States cannot be protected against abolition traitors and cutthroats within the Union, they will abandon the Union, peace or war; and, in view of this last alternative, the preparations for war will not be neglected by this projected Southern Congressional Convention. Northern men may say that this is the old Southern cry of wolf, wolf; but they will find, perhaps when it is too late, that the wolf is really at the door.

Mr. Douglas in Virginia.—How he is regarded.

The Petersburg Press is distinguished for its ability and prudence, and never fails to express its opinions frankly and timely. Regarding the coming Presidential election, it says that "the Charleston Convention will have to decide the fortunes of the Democracy for years to come, and may determine the existence of the Confederacy, for it is idle, to attempt to disguise the fact that the question of Union or disunion will rise thro' all disguises to mold the conduct of the next national campaign."

The Press then proceeds to define its position on the question of candidates; and, while it admits that Senator Hunter, of that State, is its first choice, it very strongly presents the case of Mr. Douglas in the following mild and truthful argument. It is well worthy of further circulation over the country:

For our own part we are free to confess our decided preference for a gallant son of our own State. We conceive him the man of all men in the country to present as the embodiment of just this issue—a dauntless assertion of our rights to the ultimate limit—a friend loyal to the extreme of devotion to the Union—a man who is not afraid to be logical. But next to him, we have no hesitation in avowing our preference for that long-tried, and true friend of the South, Stephen A. Douglas, and this for reasons we propose to sketch very briefly.

He is the only northern politician (that may be considered a Presidential aspirant) who has been able to sustain himself for the last ten years, in the front rank of aggressive assault on Abolitionism.

We make no imputation upon the honesty, the courage, or the ability of any man, but we point to the fact, and challenge contradiction, that he is the only man that has weathered the storm—Dickinson and Cushing and Dallas and Shields, in short, every other prominent Northern man who dared to offer resistance to the fanatical tide, was swept away, and not even the venerable name and eminent services of General Cass could purchase exception from the general fate.

Nothing is easier than to charge a man with inconsistency by a contrast of his opinions with those of others—nothing is easier than to convict a man if you permit evidence of another's guilt to compromise him, but the justice of such a course is less obvious than its facility. What we want, and what we have never yet seen, is a conviction of Douglas of insincerity, inconsistency, or disloyalty to the South on the evidence of his own acts and utterance, and till this is produced, we claim for him the praise and position of admitted services and sacrifices in the cause of the South and the Union.

We believe he is the only Northern national man who can carry more than one Northern State.

This, of course, is a matter of opinion, but the opinion is based upon the notorious fact of the last four years campaign.

We remarked above, that only thirteen of the new Northern members were

Democrats, and it is worthy of notice that four of those thirteen came from Illinois, and comprise every new member that hails from that State. In almost every other instance throughout the North, in which the member has been changed, a Black Republican has followed a Black Republican or superseded a Democrat.

That this exception in Illinois is due to the personal exertions of Judge Douglas, no one will doubt who remembers his laborious services in the local contests in that State, for the last three years particularly. The same qualities and labors which produce such effects in Illinois, would accomplish similar results elsewhere throughout the North in a Presidential canvass; and the very decided preponderance which his friends manifestly possessed in all the Northern State Conventions which have been held within the last six months confirms our opinion of his availability.

If, then, it should be the pleasure of the Charleston Convention to honor him with a nomination, we shall extend to him and challenge for him a hearty support, confident that the honor, interest, and security of the South will be compromised by no act or word of his.

Such being our feeling and position, we confess we view with great regret the ungenerous and unjust course of many southern papers—Democratic papers—toward Mr. Douglas. Anticipating the contingency of his nomination, they arraign him at the bar of public opinion, and gravely proceed to try, convict, and sentence him on the evidence of unscrupulous enemies and political rivals only less unscrupulous. Surely, even if he be all that he is charged with being, his past services entitle him to fairer dealing than this. He is not a man of coalitions, and upon the particular subject of those charges he has, as he claims with proud defiance of contradiction, written and spoken more than any other living man, North or South.

HUNTING KIDD'S TREASURE.—The editor of the Lynn (Mass.) Reporter, furnishes his readers an interesting account of a recent visit to Dungeon Rock, and his interview with Mr. Marble, who has been engaged for the last eight years in this singularly wild locality, in the wilder attempt to obtain the treasure of Kidd, the freebooter. Guided in labors at first by clairvoyants, and latterly by spiritualists, the deluded man has, with assistance of his son, blasted passage way, about eight feet in height and breadth, nearly a hundred feet in the solid rock. The last blast he made developed a fissure at the bottom—an unusual occurrence—from which issue a current of foul air that will extinguish a flame held over it. Mr. Marble believes he has less than ten feet to go to reach the long-sought cave.

MORE RICH DISCOVERIES AT WASHOE.—The Territorial Enterprise, of Dec. 10th, informs us that further extensive discoveries have been made in the Washoe region.—The California Company of Virginia City, after some six weeks' drifting have struck the main silver lead fifty feet below the surface. The ore struck promises to rival in richness that from the far-famed Ophir lead. The effect of striking this lead in the California Company's claim has been to raise the price of claims located upon the range of the main lead full five hundred per cent. The Ophir, Mexican and Central Companies find that the deeper they go the wider the silver vein becomes. The Ophir Company have reached the depth of about thirty feet, and have a lead of six feet of blue sulphuret of silver. Very lively prospecting is carried on there, 25 tunnels being now under way in that immediate district.

THE BONNER FORGERY.—The correspondent of the Springfield Republican gives the following details of the Bonner forgery:

I suppose that you have read in the newspapers of the arrest of Leach and Bishop, charged with the forgery on Mr. Bonner of the Ledger. But it has not been told in any newspaper just how that forgery came about. Not long ago a woman came to the Ledger office, and said that she wished to subscribe for ten copies of the Ledger for a friend, Miss —, of North Orange, N. J., who had not time to call, and had, therefore, commissioned her to attend to the matter. In payment, she offered a fifty-dollar bank bill, and asked for a bank check for "change," instead of the money. By means of this check she obtained Mr. Bonner's signature, and the name of the bank with which he had an account, and through it, the forgery to the amount of $3,500 was committed. On its discovery, the woman who asked for the check was remembered, but on sending to North Orange, no Miss — was found, though the postmaster was running about to find her to pay the postage on the avalanche of Ledgers which had been flowing into the post-office for a month.—The woman had also been arrested, she was helping her husband with devotion worthy of a better cause. They were taken on board the Europa, in which they had embarked for a European tour, their pockets lined with $100 notes from the National Bank.

The Vine Culture in California.

In 1857, the cultivation of the vine as a business, was first undertaken by the public to be one of the greatest resources of California. Not enough time has passed since then to allow the new vineyards to produce much fruit, but it is evident that the present rates of increase, our vineyards will, in ten years from now produce not less than 10,000,000 gallons of wine annually, and perhaps twice or thrice that amount. There are now at least 5,000,000 vines set out in the State, the principal counties being the following:

*Los Angeles, 1,400,000; *Santa Clara, 513,000; Alameda, 420,000; Sacramento, 347,000; Sonoma, 344,000; Napa, 206,000; Yolo, 200,000; Tuolumne, 138,431; Eldorado, 126,490; Placer, 90,406; *Santa Barbara, 60,500; Butte, 60,220; Monterey, 60,000; *Solano, 52,696; San Bernardino, 50,000; Yuba, 50,000; *Sutter, 50,000; Tulare, 40,177; Yuba, 40,000.

Contra Costa Calaveras* and Stanislaus* have between 20,000 and 30,000 each. Fresno, Mariposa, Santa Joaquin, San Luis Obispo, Santa Cruz, Sierra, Trinity, Nevada,* Klamath,* Colusi,* Merced,* and Humboldt, have less than 16,000 each, and from ten counties we have no returns.

From those counties marked with an asterisk, we have no returns for this year, and we supply the figures from the Assessor's report for last year.

DEATH OF "DOW JR."—Eldridge Gerry Paige, author of the Pater Sermons by "Dow Jr.," was found dying in his bed on Sunday morning Dec. 4th, by a San Francisco Police officer. After suffering from convulsions for several hours, he breathed his last. His death was undoubtedly hastened by his intemperate habits. Mr. Paige was a practical printer, as well as a humorous writer. His sermons are widely known. They are characterized by much keen appreciation of human nature, and will probably long survive the author, Poor "Dow!" His worst faults probably have always been towards himself. May he sleep in peace.—Ter. (Carson Valley) Enterprise.

NEW ZEALAND.—Examinations in the island of New Zealand, South Pacific ocean, have shown that gold exists there in great quantities and in many localities.

A SCORCHER.—The Louisville Journal says the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher has been scorching the Devil. Never mind, it will be the Devil's turn after a while.

The following slanderous paragraph goes unrebuked:

A vag has invented a new telegraph. He proposes to place a line of women fifty steps apart, and commit the news to the first of them as a secret.

A man much addicted to drinking, being extremely ill of a fever, a consultation was held in his bed-chamber, by three physicians, how to "cure the fever, and abate the thirst."—"Gentlemen," said he "I will take half the trouble off your hands; you cure the fever and I will abate the thirst myself."

Tom Moore said to Peel, on looking at the picture of an Irish orator:—"You can see the very quiver of his lips."—"Yes," said Peel, "and the arrow coming out of it." Moore was telling this to one of his countrymen, who answered: "He meant 'rrah coming out of it.'"

An Emotion.

In crossing the street
Each lady you meet,
(If she follow the prevalent fashion,)
Lifts gently her dress—
Say a foot more or less—
And keeps it thus raised till you pass on.

Whilst downward your eye
Is turned to espy
Her dear little "pins" in full motion,
And hear the feet patter,
'Tis no easy matter

To hold hard the escape pipe of your poetic fancy, and resist the inclination to throw yourself clean outside of your exterior cuticle—least wise that's our notion.

Death of an Extraordinary Character.

DIED.—In Stockholm, December 10th, 1859, John Brown, a native of Carlsrona, in Sweden, in the 60th year of his age.

The life of the subject of this notice has been an eventful one. Enbarking at the age of fifteen in the naval service of his native country (Sweden,) he sailed for England, and was in the harbor of Portsmouth when the English frigate "Bellerophon" arrived there with the Emperor Napoleon I, as a prisoner on board. He next engaged in the service of Gen. Simon Bolivar, and was present in most of the engagements which marked the progress of that patriot to power in South America. Juan Flacco, as he was called, arrived in California in 1828, and has resided in the country ever since. During the war with Mexico, while Mr. Brown was enlisted in the company of Major A. H. Gillespie, at Los Angeles, the Californians managed to surround the town, and threatened the entire destruction of Major G's force. The only possible chance for timely relief was from Commodore Stockton, who was then lying with the Savannah frigate at San Francisco. At the request of Major Gillespie, Mr. Brown undertook to carry a dispatch to Com. Stockton. Gillespie prepared the dispatch in a bundle of thirty cigars, and placing it amongst other bundles of the weed, Brown succeeded in eluding the vigilance of the Californians (then commanded by Gen. Andres Pico,) although pursued by them, and coming within an ace of being taken, he succeeded, after an unparalleled ride of four days, in delivering his message to Com. Stockton in person; the consequence was, the relief of Major Gillespie and the rescue of him and his force from utter destruction.

The time when Major Gillespie was thus surrounded was in 1846.—When he started out from Los Angeles, Juan Flacco (lean John) pretended to be a deserter from Gillespie's force, but by some imprudence his true character became known to the Mexicans, outside. He was fired upon and his horse killed under him, almost immediately. He ran on foot twenty-seven miles, and reached the ranch of a Mexican where by false representations he procured another horse, having arrived about day-break and starting at sun rise, Brown arrived at Santa Barbara, near eleven o'clock that night, and his horse was killed by the ride. Capt. Talbot gave him fresh horses and he started in the morning. Capt. Robbins furnished him with fresh horses also, and he arrived late that evening at the ranch of Mr. Burton, who also furnished horses. The next morning, after a short rest, he started and arrived at Monterey, at night. Being unable to obtain aid there for the Americans, he started the next morning for San Francisco, on an American race horse owned by Mr. Dye, which was furnished him by Captain Maddox. At Monterey Mr. Larkin, the American Consul, was absent, and Mr. Green, his clerk, gave him letters to Anjel Castro, Antonio German and others on the road, which procured him fresh horses. It is proper to say that Juan was chased by the Mexican lancers, to the ranch of Capt. Robbins. He had also a letter to Capt. Charles M. Weber, who was at that time residing in San Jose, and known to be in the American interest. Mr. Weber was absent at the time of his arrival, but fortunately Thos. O. Larkin was there when he arrived, at twelve o'clock, noon. In four hours time he again started, with horses furnished by Mr. Larkin, and at eight o'clock at night reached San Francisco, and delivered his despatches which produced the desired effect, and aid was at once despatched to the Americans, in Los Angeles. The distance from Los Angeles to Monterey, about 350 miles was traveled under adverse circumstances, in three days. From Monterey to San Francisco, 180 miles the distance was traversed between sun rise and eight o'clock, p. m.—The feat of Mr. Brown was one of the most wonderful on record. We regret to say that he has never received the compensation agreed to be paid him for the daring act, and the government is largely indebted to him for other important services.—Juan crossed the Isthmus of Panama four times previous to coming to California, and has doubled Cape Horn three times. He was taken prisoner by General Flores, in one of the South American Wars, and escaped from him to this State. Flacco was engaged in three revolutions in California, one against the Mexican Government, in 1836; in the revolution against Micheltoreno, in 1844, in which he took part with the Governor, and finally with the Americans, in the revolution of 1846.

Mr. Brown was afterwards employed by Gen. Kearney to carry an express to Col. Fremont, which he accomplished by crawling through the California camp and obtaining a horse from an acquaintance (a Californian), whom he of course deceived as to his mission. He has resided in the vicinity of this place for the last eight years. Brown was a man of strict integrity, of a social disposition and generous impulses, and of unwavering devotion to those whom he recognized as his friends. He has suffered much for the past six years of his life, with rheumatism, which had greatly shattered his constitution, and having some three weeks ago contracted a violent cold, this produced inflammation of the stomach, which ended his mortal career on Saturday last.—San Joaquin Rep.

Peculiarities of Great Men.

The Duke of Wellington was not remarkably sedulous of dress, although on grand occasions he made a sufficient display, when he wore his principal orders and decorations blazing on a coat more gorgeous than the celebrated habit of Prince Esterhazy, which, it was said, cost him £200 in repairs and damages every time it was put on. The Duke had a custom of wearing a white neckcloth in uniform, which gave him rather a slovenly look; and a flippant French duchess once called him "Le Duc de Villainton," because he appeared at a full-dress party in something less than grande tenue. He was also familiarly called in the army, "the Beau," from his usual plain attire, and apparent negligence of outward splendor. That vanity is an inherent compound or attendant of greatness, is a wide position, which admits of much argument and endless demonstration. Many distinguished men affect or adopt eccentricities, of which vanity may be the inciting cause. Lord Nelson was fond of exhibiting his stars, and delighted in having his horses taken out, and his carriage drawn by the mob. The celebrated Lord Peterborough, too, light, and vain, and proud, had no weakness of this kind. Once, the populace taking him for the Duke of Marlborough, insisted on dragging him through the streets in triumph. "Gentlemen," said he, "I can assure you by two reasons that I am not the Duke of Marlborough. In the first place, I have only five guineas in my pocket; and, in the second, they are heartily at your service." So throwing his purse among them, he got out of their hands with loud huzzas and exclamations. Richardson, in his Anecdotes, says: "The great Earl of Peterborough, who had much sense, much wit, and much whim, leaped out of his chariot one day on seeing a dancing master, with pearl colored silk stockings, lightly stepping over the broad stones and picking his way in extremely dirty weather, and ran after him (who soon took to his heels) with his drawn sword, in order to drive him into the mud, into which he, of course, followed himself." All singularities may be traced home to a certain degree of vanity, of which prevailing weakness, the old leather breeches of Frederick the Great, the coarse coat and brass buttons of Charles XII., the small cocked hat and gray capote of Napoleon, the blanket and tub of Diogenes, and even the pious beaver and modest drab of the Quaker, may be included and samples. Philosophy itself has no objection to an occasional flourish of trumpets. The ancient sages taught in the schools, and modern philomates lecture at public institutions, but who shall say that they are not as much incited by the vanity of showing their acquirements, as by the desire of instructing their fellow-citizens? Even Seneca declared, that if knowledge was bestowed on him on condition that he should not impart it, he would decline the gift.

The Queen of Spain has offered to contribute part of her civil list to defray the expense of the Morocco war. In her speech to the council of ministers, she said: "I will have valued and sold, if necessary, all my jewels for the success of the holy enterprise. I will cut down any luxury. A simple string of coral will sit more secure on my neck than a necklace of diamonds, if the latter can serve to defend our own beloved Spain and increase her renown."

THE GOLD AND SILVER CROP OF THE UNITED STATES.—The Baltic, which arrived at this port yesterday, brought from California one million seven hundred thousand dollars in gold, besides, perhaps, a quarter of a million in the hands of passengers. The gold crop of California exhibits no diminution in its yield notwithstanding the immense returns of the precious metals it has been pouring out for the past ten or eleven years. Indeed, it has been steadily increasing of late. We find that the imports of gold for 1859, up to the date of the Baltic's arrival yesterday, amount to nearly thirty-six millions, with three more shipments yet to be received between this and the end of the year, which will doubtless bring it up to forty millions, and will show an increase over the shipments of 1858 of about four millions, while the increase during that year over 1857 was close on two millions. The returns of gold from the Australian fields, it may be remarked, do not exhibit so favorable a record as this. Then, we have the Pike's Peak and Fraser river mines, both giving promise of a rich harvest in time.—Up to the present Pike's Peak has yielded from half a million to a million, and the work has not fairly commenced there, while the Fraser river mines, which are longer in operation, have given from two to three millions.

Arizona, meantime, opens to us her fruitful fields of silver, which promise to be abundant, and perhaps that Territory only requires the aid of machinery, mining skill and a ready transit to render it as valuable as California in the hardly less precious metal. When the contemplated road from Arizona to Guaymas is opened, we shall probably have such another rush of emigration as the gold discovery in California produced, and it is not unlikely that silver will soon come pouring in as plentifully from Arizona as gold from California, a fact which will effect some change in the relative value of the two metals. Before many years, then, we may be counting the gold and silver crop of the United States on an equal footing with our cotton crop, in value and importance.

WHAT SORT OF A MAN IS SEWARD.—The Herald answers the question in this somewhat personal description:

"He smokes rather too many cigars; but they are of the most fragrant tobacco, and correspond most admirably with the aroma from the cut glass, out of which he drinks success to tee-totalism and the Sons of Temperance. There are very few of our statesmen more decorous, staid and respectable than Mr. Seward. He neither fights, gambles, nor is addicted to debauchery. He is a model of private virtue. We do not believe he swears much.—His dress is propriety itself—a combination of semi-ecclesiastical gravity with an every day business look, which instantly inspires confidence. He is the avowed representative of the whole moral law, tempered by overflowing indulgence for every failing and peccadillo on the part of his fellow creatures, and especially of the niggers. What a pity that such an ideal for a future President should be gangrened with the heresy of 'irrepressible conflict!'"

Mr. Seward does not wear a white cravat. If he did, he would be taken for a Protestant minister. He might, as it is, pass very well for a priest. No one can question that he is a pious man, and a member of a church. We are not sure to what church he belongs, but he is a burning and a shining light somewhere. He may be a Methodist, and he would be an excellent class leader of that persuasion. Mr. Seward, in short, is, at present, the favorite racer in the Black Republican stud—but he will get lamed in Africa.

THE PRICE OF POLITICAL HONORS.—The Paris correspondent of the N. Y. Herald, in speaking of the death of Mr. Mason, our late Minister at Paris, says that he has left his widow and thirteen children in utter destitute circumstances—without a dollar to be divided among them. The correspondent further states that their distresses at their "great and sudden bereavement, is almost over-powering."

Three little girls were killed in Randolph, Vt., a few days ago by a ram. The animal butted them down one after the other, and then pursued them to the house, where he battered down two of the doors before he was captured. He was a good specimen of the "battering ram."

SARDINIA AND MODENA.—At the death, in June, 1807, of Cardinal York, second son of "the old Pretender," expired all the descendants of James II, and the representatives of the Royal House of Plantagenet, Tudor and Stuart, thereupon vested, by inheritance, in Charles Emanuel IV, King of Sardinia, who was eldest son of Victor Amadeus III, the grandson of Victor Amadeus, King of Sardinia, by Anne, his wife, daughter of Henrietta, Duchess of Orleans, daughter of King Charles I of England. Charles Emanuel IV died s. p. in 1819, and was succeeded by his brother, Victor Emanuel I, King of Sardinia, whose daughter and co-heiress, Beatrix, Duchess of Modena, was mother of Francis V, Duke of Modena, present heir of the Royal House of Stuart. Mr. Townsend, who has written a very curious and interesting work on The Descendants of the Stuarts, remarks on the curious coincidence, that in the ducal family of the little State of Modena are combined the representatives of three of the greatest dynasties in Europe. The Duke is himself the heir of the Royal Stuarts of England; his elder sister, Theresa, is married to Henri Comte de Chambord, de jure King of France; and his younger sister, Mary, wife of John of Spain, is mother of the Infanta Charles, who stands in the position of heir presumptive, in the male line, to the monarchy of Spain.—Sir Bernard Burke's Vicissitudes of Families.

MISCELLANEOUS.—Almost every gentleman who does me the honor to hear me, will remember that the very greatest character that he has seen in his life, and the person to whom he has looked up with the greatest wonder and reverence, was the head boy at his school. The schoolmaster himself hardly inspires such an awe. The head boy construes as well as the schoolmaster himself. When he begins to speak, the hall is hushed, and every little boy listens. He writes off copies of Latin verses as melodiously as Virgil. He is good natured, and, his own masterpieces achieved, pours out other copies of verses for other boys with astonishing ease and fluency; the idle ones only trembling lest they should be discovered in giving in their exercises, and whipped because their poems were too good. I have seen great men in my time, but never such a great one as the head boy of my childhood; we all thought he must be prime minister, and I was disappointed, in meeting him in after life, to find that he was not more than six feet high.—Thackeray.

A curious instance of the patience and perseverance of the Germans is afforded by a new Encyclopaedia, which, commenced in Berlin in 1773, has just been complete in two hundred and forty-two volumes. Six editors have been employed upon it, and notwithstanding the commotions which have shaken the country to its centre during its progress, the work has gone steadily forward, scarcely delayed by the events which furnished so much material for its pages.

Prize fighting is decidedly unpopular in Mobile. Recently one Birmingham sent Luby a challenge "to fight him a Liverpool fight in a fourteen foot ring." The police got information of the affair, arrested the parties and took them before Mayor Withers, who put it at the option of the sender of the challenge to pay a fine of $50 or to submit to a thirty days imprisonment. The challenged party being considered as half as much at fault, received half the punishment.

Books—says Lord Bacon—can never teach us the use of books; the student must learn by commerce with mankind to reduce his speculations to practice. No man should think so highly of himself, as to think he can receive but little light from books; no one so meanly, as to believe he can discover nothing but what is to be learned from them.—Dr. Johnson.

Oh, Moses!—The Rev. Hugh Blair delivered a discourse in New York, on a Sunday evening last, on the Harper's Ferry outbreak, in which he drew a parallel between Moses and Old Brown.

"Now, dearest Fred," she softly said, "You must abandon smoking; It spoils your looks—and then your breath,— Indeed, it's most provoking. Did God decree that men should be A chimney due regarded? Then, darling Fred, let it be said, Tobacco you've discarded."

"Haw well, my dear," said Fred, "I fear That will not be so easy; But, like a man, I'll try a plan, And do the best to please ye. Did God intend that woman's mind Such wondrous things should brew, love,

A NEW YORK BELLE BARELY ESCAPES MARRIAGE WITH A BOGUS CUBAN.—A New York correspondent says that during the late excitement caused by the Oviedo nuptials, a fellow representing himself as a Cuban, took lodgings of Mrs. S—, in Bleacher street. His landlady, who had read everything about Miss Bartlett's trousseau, (costing something short of $600,000,) gave him her best apartments and most desirable attentions, for she had learned from the best authority (his own,) that he was single, and, like Signor Oviedo, owned countless negroes and incalculable wealth. She presented her daughter, Josephine, a pretty blonde, gushing, silly, and fresh from school, to the sallow millionaire, and almost threw her into his arms. The bait was eagerly swallowed, and the wooing and the cooing and betrothing were hurried up as expeditiously as ever were the old lady's buckwheat cakes. Mrs. S— soon had the pleasure of announcing that her daughter was engaged to a Cuban almost as rich as Miss Bartlett's fiancée.

Don Ochando Torrero, alias Castro de Mentchermoso, her would-be son-in-law, being affected with modesty, desired a private wedding, to which Josephine, who had no father, made no objection. Her uncle, an old sea captain, arrived about nine days ago, and was let into the secret and introduced to the intended. The old salt went through the ceremony rather stiffly, and soon after demanded a private interview with his sister-in-law. "Jane," said he in gruff abruptness, "you may marry this fellow if you like, but my brother's daughter never shall!" "Why not? He is a Cuban gentleman, and as rich as—" "A gentleman! He is a nigger, and you are an old fool! I have not had to do with niggers so little as to not know a mulatto from a Spaniard! Call Jo here and let me have a few words with this black fellow alone. I'll soon run him aground, high and dry." The staunch old sailor was as good as his word, and in a marvelously short time afterward, the colored suitor's baggage was bundled out of the house, including the false diamonds he had presented to Josephine, and being assisted urgently from behind by her uncle's boots, their terror-stricken owner was not slow to follow them into the street. It is presumed he will not engage himself to another white girl till his pounded feelings are healed.

A red-faced ghost who was not quite sober, attempted to play in Hamlet in a country theatre. At length the curtain rose and play commenced. Everything passed off quietly enough till the ghost made his appearance, when there arose a continuous roar of laughter. A ghost with a red face was a novel thing, and the said ghost keeping his legs with extreme difficulty. But the noise subsided, and the play progressed smoothly, till the scene in which Hamlet, Horatio and the officers appear.

Hamlet—What! looked he frowningly?

Horatio—A countenance more in sorrow than in anger.

Hamlet—Pale or red?

Horatio—Nay, very red. "So red indeed that he looked as if he came from the very depths of the infernal regions, my lord."

If dull weather affects you, marry a warm hearted girl, and make sun shine for yourself. Bachelors will find this superior to either billards or burgundy.

A wag on seeing an old gobbler trying to swallow a cotton string, very facetiously remarked: "That was the last attempt to introduce cotton into Turkey."

Pat and the Wedded Pair.

"Last month, Gen. Sampson Dove of Winepuss, married the darter of the American Keounsel to Dublin, Miss Jemima Fox.

"Did you ever see her, stranger?" "Never," said I. "Well, that's a cruel pity, for you would have seen a peeler, I tell you—a real corn-fed gal, and no mistake, what Eve was when she 'vallied about the garden, and angels came to see her—not so everlasting thin and vapory like sunbeams. Well, they first went to Killarney on a wedding 'tower,' and after they had stared at the lovely place till they hurt their eyes, they came down here to see the Groves of Blarney, and what not.

"Well, the general didn't want folks to know that they were only just married, for the people always run to the winders and out doors to look at a bride, as if she was a bird that was only seen once in a hundred years. Its 'convenient, that's a fact, and it makes a sensitive delicate minded girl feel as awkward as a wrong boot. So says the general to Pat:

"Pat," says he, "don't go now and tell the folks that we are only just married; lie low and keep dark, will you? that's a good fellow."

"Bedad, never fear, your honor, divil a much they'll get out of me, I can tell you. Let me alone for that; I can keep a secret as well as ever a priest in Ireland."

"Well, for all that, they did stare, in a way that was a caution to owls; and well they might, too, for it ain't often they saw such a gal as Miss Jemima, I can tell you, though the Irish gals warn't behind the door when beauty was given out—that's a fact.

"At last the general seen something was in the wind, above common, for the folks looked amazed in the house, and didn't seem half pleased, either. So says he one day, 'Pat,' says he, 'I hope you did 'not tell them we were only just married, did you?'"

"Tell them you were just married, is it, yer honor?" said I, "Let me alone for that!"

"They were mighty inquisitive about it, and especially the master—he wanted to know all about it entirely. Married is it?" says I, "Why they ain't married at all, at all; divil a person ever said grace over them! But I'll tell you what," says I, "if you won't repeat it to nobody, they are going to be married in about a fortnight, for I heard him say so this blessed day, with my own ears."

If the general wasn't ravin' hop-pin' mad, it ain't no matter.

In half an hour, he and his wife were on board steamer for England, and Pat is in bed here yet from the licking he got.—[Dublin University Magazine.]

A girl out West, having professed religion, was so extremely happy that she was ever afterwards heard singing at the top of her voice that old hymn, "The love of God is coming down," &c. Nothing stops her from singing this song. One day old Jowler, the house dog, came in while she was singing and helped himself to a piece of meat that was on the table. Polly, observing the movement of Jowler, continuing her favorite song, said:

"If you don't go out I'll knock you down, Halle, Hallelujah, You nasty stinken lop-eared hound, O'glory Hallelujah."

The Kiss at School.

A district school, not far away, Mid Berkshire hills, one winter's day, Was humming with its wonted noise Of three-score mingled girls and boys, Some few upon their tasks intent, But more on furtive mischief bent; The while the master's downward look Was fastened on a copy-book. Rose shary and clear a rousing smack! As 'twere a battery of bliss! Let off in one tremendous kiss! "What's that?" the startled master cries.

That, thir," a little imp replies, "I thaw him kith Thuthamath Peathel!" With frown to make a statue thrill, The master thundered, "Hither, Will!" Like a wretch o'eraken in his track, With stolen chatties on his back, Will hung his head in fear and shame, A to the awful presence came— And great green, bashful simpton, The butt of all the good natured fun With smile suppressed and bluch upraised.

The throat-ner faltered, "I'm amazed That you, my biggest pupil, should Be guilty of an act so rude! Before the whole set school to boot— What evil genius put you to it?" "I was she, herself, sir!" sobbed the lad; "I didn't mean to be so bad; But when Susannah shook her curls, And whispered I was afraid of girls, And dursan't kiss a baby's doll, I couldn't stand it, sir, at all, But up and kissed her on the spot, I know—hoo-hoo—I ought to not, But, somehow, for her looks—hoo-hoo—I thought she kind o' wished me to!"

The Condition of Mexico—What the Three Great Powers Should Do.

The critical position of affairs in Mexico is so apparent to the public mind, that quite a contest in the invention of news announcing some definite result is going on among the smaller newspapers. A day or two ago an obscure journal of this city invented a Cabinet Council, in Washington, which determined to occupy and hold the Northern Mexican States, and the next day, with remarkable fecundity, it invented another Cabinet consultation to reconsider and countermand the news of the day previous. In this course it is merely imitating the provincial newspapers; one of which, in Mobile, has just received the wonderful intelligence that Miramon and Marquez have pocketed half a million of dollars stolen from a conducta, embarked themselves on a British steamer five hundred miles in the interior of Mexico, and that the insurgent army had pronounced in favor of Santa Anna. The only point of truth in this news is the taking of the money by General Marquez, which was fully given in our correspondence from the city of Mexico, published three days since.

The robbery perpetrated by Marquez proves to what a low point the contest now going on in Mexico has sunk, and that it has become neither more nor less than a contest between public faith and constitutional rule represented by President Juarez, and the public robbery practised by Miramon, Marquez, Robles, Cobos, and the thieves that cluster round them. That the second in command of the army under the nominal President, Miramon, should under any circumstances, have so far violated the confidence reposed in the government of which he is one of the principal arms, as to steal the treasure entrusted in good faith to his protection, on which the duties laid by law had been duly paid, and for the safety of which the merchants had pledged faith of his government, seem incredible to any one who for a moment remembers that all governments must stand or fall as they respect or violate their pledge of honor and the rights of property. In this act Marquez himself has struck a deadly blow at the government he serves.

Watching with interest, as we have, the course of affairs in Mexico, we have not been surprised at this robbery by a self-created government, for we have pointed out the precedents which have led to it, step by step, and set forth long since our conviction that this result would and must ensue. When Miramon despatched, long since, a conducta from the city of Mexico, he exacted from the merchants payments in advance for protection to the coast, which he could not give, and export duties when he knew that he held no port at which it could be embarked. When the conducta passed through the command of Gen. Robles he took possession of it, and would not give it up till the merchants consented to sanction the robbery of thirty thousand dollars already made. Nor is this the only way in which the merchants are robbed. Forced contributions are laid upon them, which they are compelled to pay, and from time to time fraudulent contracts are made for which the public faith of the republic is pledged by an insurgent government, and the public debt is largely increased by the issue of illegal securities, which all parties know must become worthless from the moment the government which issues them falls as it must fall.

For the growth and continuance of this state of things, two foreign ministers in Mexico are chiefly responsible—Mr. Olway, the British Minister, and Mons. Gabriao, the representative of France. So firm and continued has been the support which these two officials have given to the system of plunder practised by the Miramon government, that the conviction is now generally entertained, in Mexico and out of it, that they are allied with the speculators, if not with the officers themselves, and have found great profit in the alliance. It is now nearly two years since President Buchanan saw the true condition and tendency of affairs in Mexico, and recalled the American Minister. But England and France have supported their representatives until within a short period Lord John Russell has listened to the outcries of the British merchants, and called Mr. Olway home to an account. Mons. Gabriao manages to hold on, by artfully representing to the French government that the French merchants who complain of his course are red republicans, who are insatiable to do so by hatred to the empire. Louis Napoleon has yet to learn that the good name and honor of his government are stained in Mexico by the venality of a Minister who, under the cloak of a pretended zeal for France, connives not only at the robbery of French merchants, but of all other foreign residents.

The only remedy for this state of things in Mexico lies in the adoption by England and France of the course which Mr. Buchanan has so wisely pursued. They should recall their ambassadors from that republic, and send out new ones to recognize the constitutional government of President Juarez. In giving him countenance and moral support, they will soon put an end to the present struggle; for as soon as Miramon and Marquez are deprived of the countenance given to them by the Ministers of England and France, they will sink at once to their true level as public robbers. If the conduct of Marquez in robbing the money of the British and French merchants in the conducta is passed over, it becomes a new sanction to the principle of plunder which is now openly practised by the party in power in the capital of Mexico.

Our own government can also do something further than it has yet done. While the present contest in Mexico has in a great measure disintegrated European trade there, we have done nothing to foster our own commercial interests with that republic. With almost a daily communication between every city in the Union and the Rio Grande frontier, not a letter can cross that river. The mail connection with Vera Cruz has been dropped by Congress, and renewed only by private enterprise. Our correspondence with all the Gulf ports is broken off. With the west coast we are in even a worse condition. We have a mail to Acapulco, but beyond that we cannot get, when a steam line from that point to the head of the Gulf of California would not only open the whole of Western Mexico to our trans-isthmus trade, but would bring the rich regions of Arizona within the scope of active emigration and development. A small effort on our part in regard to our postal intercourse with Mexico would soon open a large trade to American enterprise, would greatly increase our influence there, and would open to the constitutional government the means of carrying out its policy for the reorganization of that republic.—N. Y. Herald.

POLITICAL JOKE.—A story is told of a Democrat and Whig disputing about the respectability of their parties, when a drunken man, whom neither of them knew, came towards them. "There," says the Whig, "I'll bet you that is a Democrat;" and as the "tight" man approached he was addressed with, "I've made a bet that you are a Democrat—how is it?" "Well," said the fellow, giving his mouth a ludicrous twist, "I admit that I've got (hic) some of the symptoms, but (hic) I'm a Whig, by thunder!"

Taylor says courtships are the sweet and dreamy thresholds of unseen Idens, where half the world has passed in couples, and talked in whispers under the moonlight, and passed on, and never returned.

A MAN WITH AN IDIOSYNCRACY.—Mr. Wilburn, in his new book, "Ten Years of a Preacher's Life," thus describes a character who once frequented (on Sundays) the St. Charles Hotel, New Orleans:

He followed wood-cutting as a profession, and wrought with exemplary zeal the six working days, hoarding every cent not required to furnish him with the most frugal fare. As his "pile" increased, he invested it in gold ornaments, watch-chains of massive links, shirt and sleeve buttons, shoe buckles, then buttons for vest and coat, a hat band of the precious metal, a heavy gold-headed cane, and in short, wherever an ounce of it could be bestowed upon his person, in or out of taste, it was done. The glory of his life, his one ambition, was to don his curious attire—which was deposited for safe keeping during the week in one of the banks—on Sunday morning, and then spend the day, "the observed of all observers," lounging about the office or the bar-room of the St. Charles Hotel. He never drank, and rarely spoke. Mystery seemed to envelop him. No one knew whence he came, or the origin of his innocent whim. Old citizens assured you, that year, his narrow savings were measured by the increase of his ornaments, until at length, the value of the anomalous garments came to be estimated by thousands of dollars. By ten o'clock, Sunday night, the exhibition was closed, his one day of self-gratification enjoyed, his costly wardrobe was returned to the bank vault, and he sank back into the obscurity of a wood-chopper.

Speaking of George Law and his wealth, the New York correspondent of the New Orleans Crescent writes that "if anything don't pay, Mr. Law respectfully drops it. He now owns nine tents of the Eighth avenue railroad, which alone is an income of a prince, and growing more valuable every day. He also owns nearly all the stock of the Ninth avenue, which, when completed, will run through Greenwich street to the Ninth avenue, and thence to Harlem river—a nine mile concern. Half the ferries belong to Law. He owns the Dry Dock Bank, and the bank owns about forty acres of docks, houses and land, almost in the heart of the city. Law owns the Staten Island ferry boats, and two miles of water front nearest New York, that in a few years will be worth, for docks, ten millions. He really owns the Flushing railroad, and Heaven knows how much more he owns. Most persons have an idea that he is an old man. No such thing. He is only fifty-one years old, and possesses one of those vigorous constitutions that will last him forty-nine years longer."

CHATEAU'S CHIROGRAPHY.—Speaking of Mr. Chateau, let me say that the best portrait of him, on a small scale, which I have seen, is the one engraved for Mr. E. G. Parker's Reminiscences. This book will also contain a facsimile of Mr. Chateau's handwriting, which has puzzled so many persons, including a Middlesex county deputy sheriff, of whom this story is told: He received a subpoena with Mr. C.'s name attached, and after contemplating it in various aspects he rushed into the office of a neighboring attorney, and asked, "What in h—ll is that?" Why, don't you know what that is?" "No; and I've been trying for two hours to find out." "Well, what should you think it was?" "Think why I should think it was Jesus Christ." "When you think of the initials, and that the number of letters is the same in both names, the mistake of the profane deputy is not to be wondered at. Mr. Chateau, I am told, was sensitive when allusions were made to his handwriting. Some one went into his office and found him reading the Post, which he laid down with the remark that he wished people would not concern themselves about his handwriting. The writer looked at the paper, and found a paragraph stating the prevalence of a rumor that Mr. Chateau was about to quit his profession and establish himself in Canton, having been offered a large salary by a merchant, who designed to employ him in lettering tea chests.

John, I saw your cousin Isaac a few weeks ago, and he had just received a fall, which cut a most dangerous gash in his arm. "Ah! poor fellow; what did he fall on?" "Well, I really forget now, but it rather strikes me that he fell on Tuesday morning."

BRITISH OPINION OF LOUIS NAPOLEON.—The following is from an article in Blackwood's Magazine, on the peace of Villafranca:

The result showed that Kossuth, with all his ability and eloquence, was but as an infant in the hands of the extraordinary man who rules France, and who now holds in his power the fortunes of Europe. Even from this little fact we can afford to lesson; for never until the old popular ideas of Louis Napoleon are displaced, and until the British public recognizes in him one of the most powerful and subtle intellects that the world has ever seen—a man gifted with the power of calculation that amounts to prescience, joined to a hand that never flinches and a tongue that never reveals—never, we say until the British public so learns to appreciate this new Napoleon, will it be possible for our government to cope with his policy, and make head against those new combinations which will date their birth from the momentous interview at Villafranca.

A good story is told of an Irish hostler, who was sent to the stable to bring out a traveler's horse. Not knowing which of the strange horses in the stalls was the traveler's, and wishing to avoid the appearance of ignorance in his business, he brought both animals. The traveler pointed out his own horse, saying, "that's my nag." "Certainly, yer honor, I know that very well, but I didn't know which was the other gentleman's."

One day a little girl, about five years old, heard a preacher of a certain denomination praying most lustily, till the roof rang with the strength of his supplications. Turning to her mother, and beckoning the maternal ear down to a speaking distance, she whispered:

"Mother, don't you think that if he lived nearer God, he wouldn't have to talk so loud?"

Such a question is worth a volume on "Elocution in Prayer."

A Zouave lost one of his fingers at the battle of Solferino. "Bon!" he exclaimed, "just my luck to lose the finger upon which I wore my wedding ring. Now my wife will insist upon it that I gave it to another woman."

Hurrah for the girls of '76!" "Thunder!" said a New Jersey Whig, "that's too plaguey old. No, no—hurrah for the girls of '17."

Midnight Musings.

There is a tranquil season, when the heart
Unmoved by earth's dull burden and its cares,
Drinks in the calm reflections, which import
A silent pleasure, like the Christian's prayers.
Tis thus we feel at midnight when alone,
And nought disturbs our quiet solitude,
When on the wings of Love so gently
borne,
Youth's first affection seems again renewed.

Again we wander in the grassy mead,
Where hours of childish joy we once
have felt;
Again with cautious steps we softly tread O'er graves and tombstones where we oft have knelt.
The sparkling brook runs gently through
the grove,
And violets cluster 'neath the shady boughs;
The broad old rock, where first we spoke
of love,
Comes in the visions of our early vows.

Like rays of sunshine on a cloudy day,
Come thoughts of youth which years
cannot efface,
And tears and sadness quickly flee away,
And grief and sorrow scarcely leave a trace.
'Tis sweet to think on each dear friend
of youth,
On every object of our dear old haunts,
On halcyon days of childhood's early
truth,
No other memory in life supplants.
TAV.

A TRUE STORY.

BY HAYWARD TAYLOR.

On the 12th of October, 1856, a celebration of a peculiar character was held in a small village near Jena. It was an occasion of an entirely local nature, and might have passed over unobserved and unknown to all except the immediate vicinity, but for its connection with the battle which fifty years and one day before annihilated the power of Prussia. An account of it, however, was published in most of the German newspapers, and this circumstance, the sequel of the story I am about to relate, was brought on. At the time the celebration took place, I was residing in Gotha, not more than fifty miles from the spot, and received the story almost in the very words of the chief actor in it. I am sorry that his name and that of the village have escaped my memory. All other particulars made too deep an impression upon me to be easily forgotten.

We must first go back to the 13th of October, 1806. On that day the windy uplands northeast of Jena witnessed the brief but terrible combat, which resulted in the triumphant entry of the French army into Berlin eleven days afterward—during which time Prussia had 60,000 men, 65 standards and 600 cannon. A portion of the French army was encamped on the battle-field, or quartered in the village around. The poor inhabitants overwhelmed by this sudden avalanche of war upon their quiet fields—where for a hundred years or more, they had reaped their harvest in peace—submitted in helpless apathy while their houses and barns were plundered by the lawless soldiery. The battle was over, but there was no lull in the blast of ruin. Through the clouds of cannon smoke which settled into the bosom of the deep valleys as the raw October evening came on, were heard in all directions shrieks of fear, yells of rage or triumph, and cries of pain or lamentation.

Davoust—the "Butcher of Hamburg," as the Germans called him—took up his quarters for the night in one of the most convenient and comfortable houses which could be found in the neighborhood of the scene of slaughter. Here he rapidly issued orders for the disposition of the forces under his command, gave directions for the morning and received reports from his adjutants. He had taken his cloak, and was about returning to an inner chamber for repose, when an officer entered. "Pardon me, general," he said, "but there is a case which requires attention.—

The German canaille must be taught to respect us. Ten soldiers of company —, of the fourth infantry,
who quartered themselves in the village of Waldorf (let us say) have been driven away by the people, and two or three of them are severely injured."

Davoust's cold eye glittered, and his mustache curled like the lip of a mastiff, as he turned, and halted a moment at the door of the bed-room.
"Send a lieutenant and twenty men to the village, pick out ten of the vagabonds and shoot them down!"
was the brief order. "Where is Waldorf?" he added, turning to one of those useful creatures who are always willing to act as guides and interpreters for the enemy in their own land.

"There is a village called upper Waldorf which lies near the head of a small valley to the left; Middle Waldorf is on the other side of the hill, and Lower Waldorf about half an hour's distance beyond."

The marshal, not caring to annoy
himself by more minute inquiries, went to bed. If ten men were shot,
that was sufficient.

The next morning, at sunrise,
Lieutenant Lamotte, with twenty men, marched over the trampled hills to seek Waldorf. It was a disagreeable business, and the sooner it was over the better. On reaching a ridge which overlooked the intersection of two or three valleys, more than one village was visible through the cold fog now beginning to rise. "Qui-est Waldorf?" inquired the officer of the man whom he had impressed by the way. "Das," answered the man,
"ish ober Waldorf," pointing to a village on the left. "En avant!" And in fifteen minutes more the Frenchman marched in the little hamlet.

Hailing in an open space between the church and the two principal beer-houses, the officer summoned the inhabitants together. The whole village was already awake, for few had slept during the night. Their ears were still stunned by the thunders of yesterday, and visions of burning and pillage still danced before their eyes. At the command of the lieutenant, the soldiers seized all the male inhabitants, and forcibly placed them in line before him. The women and children waited near inter-rible anxiety, for no one understood the words which were spoken, and these ominous preparations led them to imagine the worst.

At this juncture, the son of the village pastor appeared upon the scene. He was a young man of twenty, who was studying theology
in order to become his father's successor, and fortunately had some knowledge of French. The appearance of things, without the cries and entreaties of the terrified people, told him that his help was wanted. He immediately addressed himself to Lieutenant Lamotte, and begged for an explanation of the proceedings.

"I am ordered to punish this village," answered the latter, "for your treatment of our soldiers last night.
The marshal orders that ten of you must be shot. The only thing that I can do is, to allow you to draw lots among yourselves, or to point out those concerned in the outrage."

"But," continued the young man,
"your General has been misinformed.
No French soldiers have visited our village before you. We have truly been in great fear and anxiety
the whole night; but the valley is deep and the village is partly concealed from view by the woods on the side. There are also the villages of Middle and lower Waldorf,
which lie further down in the open valley. You can soon satisfy yourself, sir, that this village is entirely innocent; and I entreat you not to shed the blood of our harmless people."

"There is no time for investigation," said the officer. "I was ordered to proceed to Waldorf, and I am guided hither. I will wait till you make your choice of ten men to be sacrificed, but have no authority to do more."

By this time the people had learn-

women in tears and appealing gestures crowded around the officer begging him to spare their sons and husbands—the men stood silent, with bloodless faces and dumb, imploring eyes. The scene was evidently painful, both to the officer and the soldiers, accustomed as they were to the unmerciful code of war. They were anxious to put an end to it and leave; but the clergyman's son, inspired with the belief that the fate of ten men rested upon his efforts, continued to urge his plea with a zeal and eloquence that would not be set aside.

Lieut. Lamotte struggled awhile between his sense of duty and his natural humanity, while the young advocate appealed to his conscience and to the obedience which he owed to a higher commander than Davoust. Finally he consented to wait while a sergeant was dispatched to head-quarters, accompanied by a peasant to show him the nearest way. A few lines hastily penciled stated the facts in the case,
and asked for further instructions.

Meanwhile the inhabitants waited,
in a state of suspense scarcely to be endured. Lieut. Lamotte—who as a thorough Frenchman, soon wearied of a painful emotion, and shaking it off at the risk of appearing heartless,
said: "The morning is keen, and a walk before sunrise does not diminish the appetite—can you give us
some refreshments from your hidden supplies?" At a word from the young man, many of the women brought together the coffee they had prepared for their own breakfast, with black bread, mugs of beer, and a small cheese or two—sufficient for a rough meal—of which the soldiers partook with the usual laughing comments on
"la cuisine Allemande." The company of victims looked on in silence,
and more than once muttered, gloom-ily: "we are feeding our executioners."

"Even if that should be true,"
said the young man, "it is but doing as Christ has taught us. Whether or not we obtain Christian charity from these men, let us, at least, show them that we are Christians."

This rebuke had its effect. A few of the men assisted in entertaining
the soldiers, and the latter, with their facility for fraternization, soon made themselves at home. As the stomach fills the heart also enlarges, and the men began to say among themselves: "It is a pity these men should be shot by mistake."

It was not long before the sergeant and his guide arrived. The former handed the lieutenant a note, which he hastily tore open and read.—
"Waste no time in parley. It is indifferent which village is punished;
an example must be made. Do your duty and return instantly." So ran the pitiless answer.

"Choose your men!" said the lieutenant, rising to his feet, and grinding his teeth to keep down his faltering heart. But now the lamentations broke out afresh. The women clung around the men who were dear to them, and many of the latter, overcome by the general distress, uttered loud cries and prayers for mercy.—
The young man knelt down in front of them, saying to the officer: "I do not kneel to you; but I will pray to God that he will remove the sin of slaughter from your soul."

As the officer met his earnest eyes,
full of a sublime calmness and courage, his own suddenly filled with tears. He turned to his men who stood drawn up in line before him, but no word was spoken. Their hands were in their proper places, according to drill regulations; and there were drops on many cheeks
which they could not wipe away.—
There was a silent question in the officer's eye—a silent answer in theirs. The former turned hurriedly, beckoned the young man to him, and whispered in an agitated voice:

"My friend, I will save you by stratagem. Choose ten of your most courageous men, place them in a line
before me and I will order my soldiers to shoot them through the head;
at the instant I give the order to fire,
they must fall flat on the ground; my soldiers will aim high, and no one will be injured; as soon as the volley is fired I will give the order to march;
but no one must stir from this place
until we are out of sight."

These words were instantly translated to the people, but so great was move. The pastor's son then took his place, alone, in the vacant space

before the line of soldiers. "I offer myself," said he, "as one trusting in God that we shall all be saved; and I call upon those of you who have the hearts of men in your bodies to stand beside me." Young Conrad,
a sturdy farmer, and but newly a bridegroom, joined him—casting as he did so a single encouraging look upon his future wife, who turned deadly pale but spoke not a word.
One by one, as men who had resolved to face death—for most of them had but a trembling half confidence in their escape—eight others walked out and took their places in line.—
The women shuddered and hid their eyes; the men looked steadily on at the fascination of terror; and the little children in awed but ignorant curiosity. The plade was as silent as if devoid of life.

Again the lieutenant surveyed his
men. "Take aim!" he commanded.
He continued—"aim at their heads,
that your work may be well done!"
But though his voice was clear and strong, and the tenor of his words
not to be mistaken, a clairvoyant flash of hidden meaning ran down the line, and the men understood him.
Then came the last command: "Fire!"
but in the second which intervened between the word and the ringing volley the ten men were already falling. The crack of muskets and sound of their bodies were simultaneous. Without pausing an instant the lieutenant cried: "Right about wheel!" "Forward!" and the measured tramp of the soldiers rang down
the narrow village street.

The women uncovered their eyes and gazed. There lay the ten men, motionless and apparently lifeless.
With wild cries they gathered around them; but ere their exclamations of despair had turned into those of joy,
the last of the soldiers had disappeared in the wood. Then followed weeping embraces, as all arose from the ground—laughter, and sobs of hysterical joy. The pastor's son, uncovering his head knelt down,
while all reverently followed his example, and uttered an eloquent prayer of thanksgiving for their deliverance.

What this young man had done
was not suffered to go unrewarded.
A blessing rested upon his labors and his life. In the course of time he became a clergyman, filling for a while his father's place, for the people he had saved but was afterwards led to a wider and more ambitious sphere. He was called to Leipzig, received the degree of Doctor of Divinity, and finally became known throughout Germany as the founder of the Gustav Adolf Verein (Gustavus Adolphus Union), which has for its object the dissemination of Protestant principles by means of voluntary contributions. In some respects it resembles the Home Missions of our country. Many churches, built by this association, are now scattered throughout the United States.

The inhabitants of Waldorf never forgot their pastor, nor he them.—
He came back from time to time to spend a few days in the quiet little village of his youth, and where the most eventful crisis of his life was passed.

In 1856, three out of the ten pseudo victims of Davoust were still living in their old homes, and the people bethought them that the semicentennial anniversary of such an event deserved a special celebration.— Dr. —, of Leipzig (formerly the pastor's son,) was invited to be with them. He came—he would have come from the ends of the earth—and after a solemn religious service in the church, proceeded to the very spot on which he had stood and faced the French muskets, and there related to the children and grand-children
of those he had saved, the narrative
which I have here given in less moving and eloquent words. Those who were present described the scene as singularly impressive and affecting.
The three old men sat near him as he spoke; and the emotions of that hour of trial were so vividly reproduced in their minds, that, at the close, they laughed and wept as they had done on the same day fifty years before.

In conclusion, the speaker referred to the officer whose humane stratagem had preserved their lives—never heard of him. I did not even learn his name; but he is ever remembered in my prayers. Most probably he died a soldier's death on one of the many fields of slaughter which intervened between Jena and Waterloo; but if he should be living, it would cheer my last days on earth

if I could reach him with a single word of gratitude.

In the same year there lived—
and no doubt, still is living—in Lyons an invalid and pensioned captain of the Napoleonic wars. After a life of vicissitudes, he found himself in his old age, alone, forgotten, poor. Men no better and braver than he had achieved distinction by some lucky chance; fortune had come to others,
and others had begotten children to cheer and vitalize their declining days. Him the world had passed by, and for years he had been living a quiet, silent, pinched life, by the aid of his scanty pension. His daily resort was a cafe, where he could see and read the principal European journals, and perhaps measure the changed politics of the present time
by the experience of his past life.

One day in November, 1856, he entered the cafe as usual, took his accustomed seat as he was wont to do,
and picked up the nearest paper.—
It happened to be the Augsburg Allgemeine Zeitung; but he had spent some years in Germany, and understood the language tolerably. His attention was attracted by a letter dated Jena. "Jena!" he thinks, "I was there too: what is going on there now? He reads a little further.— "Celebration at Waldorf. Waldorf!
The name is familiar, where have I heard it?" As he continues his perusal, the old captain's excitement, so unusual a circumstance, attracts the attention of all the other habitués of the cafe. "Grand Dieu, Davoust—Waldorf—the ten men—the pastor's son! Did I dream such a thing, or is this the same?" Forgotten for years and years: effaced by a hundred other military adventures—
overlaid and lost in the crowded stores
of a soldier's memory, the scene came to light again. The pastor's son still lived, still remembered and thanked the preserver of his native village! Many a long year had passed since such a glow warmed
the chambers of the old man's heart.

That evening he wrote to Dr. —
in Leipzig. He was ill, and but a few months distant from his last hour,
but the soldier's letter seemed like a Providential answer to his prayers,
and brightening the flickering close of his life. A manly and affectionate correspondence was carried on between the two while the latter lived.
The circumstance, by me public,
and the deed was officially recognized in a way most flattering to the pride of Capt. Lamotte. The Grand Duke of Saxe Weimar and the King of Saxony conferred upon him the orders of their respective houses,
which were followed soon afterward
by the cross of the legion of honor from Louis Napoleon, and an increase of his pension, which assured him
ease and comfort the rest of his life.
A translation of the doctor's narrative, published in the French-papers, drew attention to him, and he was no longer a neglected fre-quenter of the cafe. He was known and honored, even without his three orders.

"Cast thy bread upon the waters,
and thou shalt find it again after many days."

SICKLES IN THE HOUSE.—A correspondent of the Philadelphia Press,
speaking of the opening of Congress,
says:

"SICKLES was not present when his name was called, but entered before the roll was gotten through.— He walked placidly round the centre row of seats and dropped into a seat on the third bench. He looks well, and has grown his beard so as to make a tolerable effective disguise.
He was the only solitary man in that large assemblage. He was not spoken to."

"Mr. G. has spoken ill of you,"
said a gossip to his friend, a man who thoroughly understood the world.—
"That astonishes me," was his reply.
"I never rendered him any service."

It has been inferred that Dryden
was not opposed to sherry cobbler,
from a remark he once made—

SELLING THE LAWYERS.—On Sunday night last, a stray "Billy Goat," who had been a source of annoyance to the police, was picked up by one of the officers of the sixth precinct, and conveyed to the station house, where he was locked up in a cell like any other vagabond.
On Monday morning the officers thought they would make a little fun out of "Billy's" capture. So they sent word to a noted criminal lawyer at the Tombs that a client of his, named William Goetz, had been arrested and was then confined in a cell at the sixth precinct station house. Seizing his hat and cane, the lawyer rushed to the rescue of his unfortunate client, resolved, if possible, to ge-him bailed out. On applying to the Sergeant in charge, the following dialogue ensued:

Counsel for William Goetz—"Sergeant,
I would like to see one of your prisoners
a few moments."

Sergeant (up to the joke)—What is his name, sir?

Counsel—"William Goetz."

Sergeant—"Ah, yes. Hard case—very bad character. Do you know him?"

Counsel—"Know him! Yes, indeed, I do, and can assure you that you are entirely mistaken in regard to his character. I have known him for fifteen years, and can vouch for his respectability.—
Why he was once a member of the Common Council."

Sergeant—"Here, Jimmy, show the gentleman to the cell of Mr. Goetz."

Exit counsel down stair to the cells.
Arriving at No. 4 he throws open the door and calls "Mr. Goetz! Mr. Goetz!"

"Billy," being tired of his confinement, and seeing a chance of escape, with a joyful and prolonged "ba-aa," rushes toward the door, and suddenly makes his exit between the counselor's legs, leaving that astonished and slightly mortified individual to ruefully reflect as he sits on the floor of the cell, upon the ludicrous plight into which he has fallen.
"Mr. Goetz" cuts up snappy pranks in and about the premises, in commemoration of his escape, while his counsel, recovering his perpendicularity, immediately takes to his heels, and shows the laughing policemen a straight coat tail as he disappears around the corner. Of course the joke is considered too good to stop at this point, and the aggrieved counselor must have his revenge, so he sends another lawyer on the same errand, who is likewise sold, and he takes his revenge on a third. In this way six or eight noted criminal lawyers visited the sixth ward station house on Monday to see a client named "William Goetz."—*N. Y.

THE VALLEY TAN.

STEPHEN DEWOLFE, EDITOR.

Wednesday, Jan. 18, 1860.

We returned, on Monday evening last, from a hasty visit to Camp Floyd. Every thing at that military post, so far as we saw, was as quiet, orderly and dull as quietness and dullness could be. Even "Frog," as the usually fast town of Fairfield is familiarly dubbed, seems to have caught the dullness of its military neighbor, and it presents the demureness, and if it had the addition of a church spire or two, the sanctified appearance of a New England village. But there is a great deal of "out-coming" in "Frog," and all are anticipating a revival of trade there before long. We should not omit to mention that the different theatrical companies at the Camp are doing all they can to relieve the dullness and monotony which prevails. We attended, on Saturday evening last, an entertainment by the Military Dramatic Association. The play was well performed—the music by the orchestra was excellent—the Irish song amusing—and the dance was—well, it was some; and we felt something like Simon Suggs, when he went to the theatre down in Savannah, "twas astonishing" to us how that gal did git down to her work."

Left for the States.

Dr. Joshua Hobbs, agent of Russell, Majors & Waddell, in this Territory, and Mr. J. M. Livingston, of the firm of Livingston, Bell & Co., left yesterday morning for "America." They were accompanied by Mr. C. Decker, an experienced mountaineer and traveler, who will go with them as far as Rocky Ridge, from which place they will proceed by the St. Joseph and Salt Lake mail line. Mr. John Kerr also left for the States by the Express of last Friday. The weather is inclement, and a trip across the plains at this season is necessarily attended by many hardships, and some suffering. Mr. Kerr, as is well known, has been confined in this city, for three months past with a broken limb, occasioned by the upsetting of the mail coach in descending the Little Mountain, near this city, in September last, after he had started home. He has so far recovered from the effects of the accident as to be able to undertake again the trip, then suddenly terminated, and it is to be hoped that he will, this time, accomplish it without accident, and with as little hardship as the length of the trip, and the reason in which it is undertaken, will admit of.

Robbery at Camp Floyd.

We learned while at Camp Floyd a day or two ago, that the office of Capt. P. T. Turnley, Asst. Quarter Master at that post, was entered on Saturday night last, and twelve hundred dollars in gold abstracted from a safe in the room. The robbery was evidently perpetrated by some one perfectly acquainted with the premises, and with the situation of things in the office. The key which locked the office was kept in a place where no one not knowing where it was, would have thought of looking for it; then the key of the safe from which the money was taken, was placed beneath a bundle of papers and locked in a desk. The thief, whoever he was, must have known where both these keys were, as he first unlocked the door of the office and replaced the key in its hiding place; he then obtained the key of the safe by breaking open the lid of the desk, leaving all the papers in the desk undisturbed.

We understood, before leaving Camp, that a messenger, employed in the office, was suspected of having committed the robbery, and that he had been arrested on the charge, but as we have heard nothing of the testimony against him, or of the result of the examination, which we presume he has before this undergone, we of course know nothing concerning his guilt or innocence, any farther than that he has heretofore enjoyed, in the office where he was employed, a reputation for honesty.

The following General Order from the Commanding Officer to the troops at Camp Floyd, has been published in both the Mormon journals of this city. Not wishing to be behind them in the consideration or respect which they show to any order emanating from the source from which this proceeds, we also give it an insertion in our columns; and in connection with merely add that, while any one has the right to coin gold, or to put it into any shape that they please, so that it is not made in imitation of government coin, it does not thereby become money strictly speaking, at least it is not a legal tender, and it is really worth only the mint value of the gold that it more, they take it for more than its value.

Some of the coin referred to in this order, we think bears unmistakable evidence of having been stamped since 1848 or 9. From its brightness we should judge that it was very recently made.

GENERAL ORDERS, }
No. 4. }

The commanding officer has been informed that there is a large amount of gold coin, several thousands of dollars, purporting to be worth five dollars, commonly called "Mormon coin," about to be put in circulation in Fairfield.

As this coin is understood to be worth only (about) four and one half dollars, he recommends to the soldiers not to receive it for more than that sum, and better still, not to take it at all.

By order of Bv. Col. C. F. Smith.

Post Adjutant.

We understand that Messrs Young & Irwin sold yesterday their entire stock of goods on hand here to Messrs Woodmansee & Bro. The gentle merchants are one after another selling out, and there are now but five or six left in the trade here.

Another ball will come off at the Townsend House next Thursday evening. Prepare yourselves, gentlemen, with the "spendulicks" and with a lady!

Latest News by the Express.

By the Express which arrived here on Monday, St. Louis papers as late as the 23rd of December were received. The news, however, is not important. No Speaker has yet been elected by the House of Representatives. The Republicans still continue to sustain Sherman, of Ohio, for that position, while the Democrats, up to the last ballot, gave their votes as heretofore, to Bocock, of Virginia. On the seventeenth ballot, which is the last of which advices have been received, held on the 21st December, the whole number of votes cast was 226; of these Sherman received 106. Millson, of Va., 96, Gilmer, of N. C., 6, Etheridge, of Tenn., 7, Davis, of Md., 4, and 7 scattering. The general impression seems to be that Sherman will be finally elected, though he appears at present little nearer that result than he did on the first ballot that was held.

Since the contest for Speaker has been going on, a good deal of excited, and some acrimonious debate has taken place among the members, and once or twice a collision has been near taking place between some of them; but thus far none has occurred. Among the encounters in debate, we observe one that took place on the 14th of December, between Roger A. Pryor, of Va., and Thomas A. R. Nelson, of Tenn., in which the gallant cavalier from Va. found an equal, if not an overmatch in his Tennessee adversary. They are both new members, neither of them having been in Congress heretofore; but Mr. Pryor is well known throughout the country as a vigorous and able writer, and as a somewhat ultra politician, of whom high anticipations have been expressed concerning the brilliancy of his career in Congress. Mr. Nelson is less widely known than Mr. Pryor, but is one among the ablest lawyers in the State which he in part represents, and as a sound reasoner, and wary and skillful tactician, we doubt not, will prove himself the equal of almost any member of the House.

While the House is indulging in wrangling and gladiatorial passages between the different members, the Senate is moving on in its usual staid and dignified course. Several bills and resolutions have been introduced, and members have given notice of other bills which they intend introducing. Among the resolutions, we find the following from Mr. Pugh of Ohio:

"Resolved, that the committee on Territories be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the act for the organization of the Territorial Governments of New Mexico and Utah as requires all laws passed by those Territories to be submitted to Congress for their approval or rejection."

Mr. Hale said it was not in order to proceed to legislate in business prior to the organization of the House.

Mr. Pugh called up this resolution a second time, on the 19th of December, when Mr. Harlan, of Iowa, moved to amend by adding, "that the Committee on Territories be also instructed to inquire into the propriety of authorizing the people of New Mexico and Utah to elect all their Territorial officers, executive, legislative, and judicial, in such a manner as the Legislatures thereof shall provide."

At this stage, Mr. Green moved that the discussion on the resolution be postponed till the Committee on Territories was organized. Mr. Hale concurred in of Mr. Green was agreed to, and the consideration of the subject postponed till Monday.

Copeland, Green, Cook and Coppie, four more of the Harper's Ferry invaders and murderers, were executed at Charlestown, Va., on the 16th or December, in accordance with the terms of their sentence. Copeland and Green, (negroes) were executed shortly after eleven o'clock in the morning, and Cook and Coppie between one and two in the evening. Great efforts, it is said, were made by Gov. Willard of Indiana, who is connected with Cook by marriage, to gain a commutation of his punishment to imprisonment for life; but his efforts were unavailing, and a life, which had it not been for one rash and mad act, might have passed in usefulness and respectability, has closed in disgrace and dishonor. The evening before the execution, Cook and Coppie came near effecting their escape. They succeeded in removing their shackles, and in getting out of the cell in which they were confined; but in trying to scale the wall which surrounded the jail yard, they were discovered by one of the guard on the outside, who instantly fired on them, and came near hitting Cook. The prisoners instantly jumped back into the yard, and were soon after retaken and lodged in a more secure cell, with extra guards stationed about the jail.

Great Union Demonstration in Boston—Speech of Mr. Everett.

There was a great Union demonstration meeting held at Boston, on the 8th of December, which was participated in by conservative men of all parties, without distinction as to what particular party or shade of politics they professed. The leading speakers were the Hon. Edward Everett, Ex-Gov. Lincoln and Hon. Caleb Cushing. Ex-President Pierce also wrote a letter abounding in conservative and patriotic views in regard to the Union; but the great feature of the occasion was the noble address of Mr. Everett, the lofty patriotism and high toned eloquence of which has been rarely if ever excelled. We subjoin the closing part of Mr. Everett's address:

Mr. Chairman, those who look upon the existing excitement at the South as faction or extravagant have, I fear, formed a very inadequate idea of the nature of such an attempt as that which was made at Harper's Ferry was intended to be, and would have been, had it proved successful. It is to wait of reflection on this point that we must ascribe the fact that any civilized man, in his right mind, and still more any man of intelligence and moral discernment in other respects, can be found to approve and sympathize with it. I am sure if such persons would bring home to their minds, in any distinct conception, the real nature of the undertaking, they would be themselves amazed that they had ever given it their sympathy. It appears, from his own statements, and those of his deluded associates, of his biographer, of his wretched wife, that the unhappy man who has just paid the forfeit of his life had for years meditated a general insurrection in the Southern States; that he thought the time had now come to effect it; that the slaves were ready to rise, and the non-slaveholding whites to join them; and both united were ready to form a new Commonwealth, of which the constitution was organized, and the officers chosen. With this wild, but thoroughly matured plan, he provides weapons for those on whose rising he calculated at Harper's Ferry; he seizes the national arsenal, where there was a supply of arms for a hundred thousand men, and he intended, if unable to maintain himself at once in the open country, to retreat to the mountains, and from their fastnesses, harass, paralyze, and finally revolutionize the South. To talk of the pikes and rifles not being intended for offensive purposes is simply absurd. The first act almost of the party was to shoot down a free colored man, whom they were attempting to impress, and who fled from them. One might as well say that the rifled ordnance of Louis Napoleon was intended only for self-defence, to be used in case the Austrians should undertake to arrest his march.

No, sir, it was an attempt to do on a vast scale what was done in St. Domingo in 1791, where the colored population was about equal to that of Virginia; and if any one would form a distinct idea what such an operation is, let him see it—not as a matter of vague conception—a crude project—in the mind of a heated fanatic, but as it is told in the sober pages of history, that record the revolt in that island; the midnight burnings, the wholesale massacres, the merciless torture, the abominations not to be named by Christian lips in the hearing of Christian ears—some of which, too unutterably atrocious for the English language, are of necessity veiled in the obscurity of the Latin tongue. Allow me to read you a few sentences from the historian of these events:

"In the town itself, the general belief for some time was, that the revolt was by no means an extensive one, but a sudden and partial insurrection only. The largest sugar plantation on the plain was that of Mons. Gallifet, situated about eight miles from the town, the negroes belonging to which had always been treated with such kindness and liberality, and possessed so many advantages, that it became a proverbial expression among the lower white people, in speaking of any good man's fortune, to say, il est heureux comme un negre de Gallifet (he is as happy as one of M. Gallifet's negroes.) M. Odeluc, an attorney, or agent, for this plantation, was a member of the General Assembly, and being

ing to it would remain firm in their obedience, determined to repair thither to encourage them in opposing the insurgents; to which end he desired the assistance of a few soldiers from the town guard, which was granted him. He proceeded accordingly, but on approaching the estate, to his surprise he found all the negroes in arms on the side of the rebels, and he had to tell, their standard was the body of a white infant, which they had recently impaled on a stake. M. Odeluc had advanced too far to retreat undiscovered, and both he and a friend who had accompanied him, with most of the soldiers, were killed without mercy. Two or three only of the patrol escaped by flight, and conveyed the dreadful tidings to the inhabitants of the town.

"By this time, all or most of the white persons who had been found on the several plantations, being massacred or forced to seek their safety in flight, the ruffians exchanged the sword for the torch. The buildings and cane fields were everywhere set on fire; and the conflagrations, which were visible from the town, in a thousand different quarters, furnished a prospect more shocking, and reflections more dismal, than fancy can paint, or the powers of man describe."

Such, Sir, as a matter of history, is a servile insurrection. Now let us take a glance at the state of things in the Southern States, co-members as they are with us in the great Republican Confederacy. Let us consider over what sort of a population it is, that some persons among us think it not only right and commendable, but in the highest degree heroic, saint-like, god-like, to extend the awful calamity, which turned St. Domingo into a heap of bloody ashes in 1791. There are between three and four millions of the colored race scattered through the Southern and South-western States, in small groups, in cities, towns, villages, and in larger bodies on isolated plantations; in the house the factory and the field; mingled together with the dominant race in the various pursuits of life; the latter amounting in the aggregate to eight or nine millions, if I rightly recollect the numbers.

Upon this community, thus composed, it was the design of Brown to let loose the hell-hounds of a servile insurrection, and to bring on a struggle which for magnitude, atrocity and horror would have stood alone in the history of the world. And these eight or nine millions, against whom this frightful war was levied, are our fellow-citizens, entitled with us to the protection of that compact of Government, which recognizes their relation to the colored race—a compact which every sworn officer of the Union or of the States is bound by his oath to support. Among them, sir, is a fair proportion of men and women of education and culture—of moral and religious lives and characters—virtuous fathers, mothers, sons and daughters, persons who would adorn any station of society in any country—men who read the same Bible that we do, and in the name of the same master kneel at the throne of the same God—forming a class of men from which have gone forth some of the greatest and purest characters which adorn our history—Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Marshall. These are the men, the women, for whose bosoms pikes and rifles are manufactured in New England, to be placed in the hands of an ignorant subject race, supposed, most wrongfully, as recent events have shown, to be waiting only for an opportunity to use them.

Sir, I have on three or four different occasions in early life and more recently, visited all the Southern and South-western States, with the exception of Arkansas and Alabama. I have enjoyed the hospitality of the city and the country; I have had the privilege before crowded and favoring audiences, to hold up the character of the father of his country, and to inculcate the blessings of the Union, in the same precise terms in which I have done it here at home, and in the other portions of the land. I have been admitted to the confidence of the domestic circle, and I have seen there touching manifestations of the kindest feelings by which that circle, in all its members, high and low, master and servant, can be bound together; and when I contemplate the horrors that would have ensued had the tragedy on which the curtain rose at Harper's Ferry, been acted out, through all its scenes of fire and sword, of lust and murder, of rapine and desolation, to the final catastrophe, I am filled with emotions to which no words can do justice. There could of course be but one result, and that well deserving the thoughtful meditation of those, if any such there be, who think that the welfare of the colored race could by any possibility be promoted by the success of such a movement, and who are willing to purchase that result by so costly a sacrifice. The colored population of St. Domingo amounted to but little short of half a million, while the whites amounted to only 30,000. The white population of the Southern States alone, in the aggregate, outnumber the colored race in the ratio of two to one; in the Union at large in the ratio of seven to one, and if (which Heaven avert) they should be brought into conflict, it could end only in the extermination of the latter after scenes of woe for which language is too faint; and for which the liveliest fancy has no adequate images of horror.

Such being the case, some one may ask why does not the South fortify herself against the possible occurrence of such a catastrophe, by doing away with the one great source from which alone it can spring. This is a question easily asked, and I am not aware that it is our duty at the North to answer it; but it may be observed that great and radical changes in the framework of society, involving the relations of twelve millions of men, will not wait on the bidding of an impatient philanthropy. They can only be brought about in the lapse of time, by the steady operation of physical, economical, and moral causes. Have those, who rebuke the South for the continuance of Slavery, considered that neither the present generation nor the preceding one is responsible for its existence? The African Slave trade was prohibited by act of Congress 51 years ago, and many years earlier by the separate Southern States. The entire colored population, with the exception, perhaps, of a few hundreds sur-soil. Their ancestors were conveyed from Africa in the ships of Old England and New England. They now number between three and four millions. Has any person, of any party or opinion, proposed, in sober earnest, a practical method of wholesale emancipation? I believe most persons, in all parts of the country, are of opinion, that free labor is steadily gaining ground. It would, in my judgment, have already prevailed in the two northern tiers of the slaveholding States, had its advances not been unhappily retarded by the irritating agitators of the day.

But has any person, whose opinion is entitled to the slightest respect, ever undertaken to sketch out the details of a plan for effecting the change at once, by any legislative measure that could be adopted? Consider only, I pray you, that it would be to ask the South to give up one thousand millions of property, which she holds by a title satisfactory to herself, as the first step. Then estimate the cost of an adequate outfit for the self-support of the emancipated millions; then reflect on the derangement of the entire industrial system of the South, and all the branches of commerce and manufactures that depend on its great staples; then the necessity of conferring equal political privileges on the emancipated race, who being free would be content with nothing less, if anything less were consistent with our political system; then the consequent organization of two political parties on the basis of color, and the eternal feud which would rage between them; and finally the overflow into the free States of a vast multitude of needy and helpless emigrants, who, being excluded from many of them (and among others from Kansas) would prove doubly burdensome, were they admitted. Should we, sir, with all our sympathy for the colored race, give a very cordial reception to two or three hundred thousand destitute emancipated slaves? Does not every candid man see, that every one of these steps presents difficulties of the most formidable character—difficulties for which, as far as I know, no man and no party has proposed a solution.

And is it, sir, for the attainment of objects so manifestly impracticable, pursued, too, by the bloody pathways of treason and murder, that we will allow the stupendous evil which now threatens us, to come upon the country? Shall we permit this curiously compacted body politic; the nicest adjustment of human wisdom, to go in pieces? Will we blast this beautiful symmetric form; paralyze this powerful arm of public strength; smite with imbecility this great National Intellect? Where, sir, O where, will be the flag of the United States? Where our rapidly increasing influence in the family of nations? Already they are rejoicing in our divisions. The last foreign journal which I have read, in commenting upon the event at Harper's Ferry, dwells upon it as something that "will compel us to keep the peace with the powers of Europe," and that means to take the law from them in our own international relations.

I meant to have spoken of the wreck of that magnificent and mutually beneficial commercial intercourse which now exists between the producing and manufacturing States—on the hostile tariffs in time of peace and the habitually recurring border wars by which it will be annihilated. I meant to have said a word of the Navy of the United States, and the rich inheritance of its common glories. Shall we give up this? The memory of our Fathers—of those happy days when the men of the North and the South stood together for the country, on hard-fought fields; when the South sent her Washington to Massachusetts, and New England sent her Greene to Carolina—is all this forgotten? "Is all the counsel that we two have shared" all the joint labors to found this great Republic—is this "all forgot?" and will we permit this last great experiment of Confederate Republicanism to become a proverb and a by-word to the nations? No, fellow-citizens, no. This glorious Union shall not perish. Precious legacy of our Fathers, it shall go down, honored and cherished, to our children. Generations unborn shall enjoy its privileges as we have done, and if we leave them poor in all besides we will transmit to them the boundless wealth of this blessing.

B. F. Hallet, Democrat, of Massachusetts, made a speech at Lowell the other day, in which the following home thrusts occur:

There were two heresies of the Republican party—enmity to foreign labor and hatred to the South. He showed what had been gained to the public wealth and private prosperity, by the infusion of the wealth of labor brought here by emigration, and that American laborers had been advanced and elevated by it. He next demonstrated the folly and wickedness of a party in this Commonwealth, where we lived by spindles, inciting the people to hatred against the South, whose form of slave labor supplied the great material of industry, cotton, without which Lowell would have remained a desert. Annihilate cotton and she would return to the desert. The men and women of Lowell worked up cotton enough every week to make a belt round the earth, and how would they live without cotton? And yet they were listening to and being led by preachers, lecturers and politicians, who taught them that their whole duty to God and man consisted in hatred to the South! they concealed from them the truth which lies at the bottom of all this, and makes their teachings and acts a mountain of hypocrisy, namely, that Massachusetts builds her mills, ships, houses and cities, out of slave cotton; that she freights three-fourths of her vessels with slave cotton; that she annually sends out for sale thirty-six millions of fabrics woven by her anti-slavery citizens out of slave cotton; and that to do all this she employs, and is directly responsible for it as if she owned them, about three hundred thousand slaves to raise cotton for her in the Southern States. And with all this slave cotton, and slave sugar, and slave rice, and slave tobacco, filling her pockets with wealth and the families with comfort, she stands apart, Pharisee like, to pray and "thank God she is not like those publicans and sinners," the slave-

The Funeral of Washington Irving.

[From the New York Evening Post.]
Yesterday the funeral of Washington Irving took place at Tarrytown, where for twenty-one years the great author had resided, and to almost every inhabitant of which he was a personal friend. Indeed, the unanimity with which the people of that vicinity flocked to do honor to the memory of their late fellow-townsmen, was the spontaneous exhibition of their personal regard rather than an ovation to the genius and talent of a world-renowned author.

According to previous arrangement the stores at Tarrytown were closed yesterday, and many of them draped with black and white muslin. This gave a peculiar air of melancholy to the aspect of this quiet village, to which the slow tolling of the church bells gave an additional mournfulness. The numerous visitors from New York, most of whom came by the eleven o'clock train from the city, reaching Tarrytown at about noon, were thus at once reminded of the solemnity of the occasion and of the mournful character of their visit.

It would be difficult to estimate the number of persons that visited the village, to attend the funeral of Mr. Irving. We were, however, assured by an old inhabitant that on only one previous occasion had there been so large a concourse of people in Tarrytown. That occasion was the dedication of the monument erected to the memory of Paulding, Williams and Van Wert, on the spot where those patriots captured Major Andre. Certainly on no previous occasion has the village contained such an array of men eminent in the various walks of literature and commerce.

The principal road at Tarrytown, after leaving the depot, and passing by a number of the principal stores and the hotels, winds up a short steep hill, and continues running eastwardly for about a quarter of a mile, until it meets the main road running from New York northward, parallel with the Hudson river. The upper part of the village has a more rustic appearance than the portion beneath the hill, as the houses are detached, and stand in large gardens surrounded by rich foliage, which even yet has not entirely disappeared.

At the crossing, where the road from the depot meets the main road, which, during its course through Tarrytown, is called "Broadway," an arch or canopy of black and white drapery decorated the street. To the south, about two miles from the junction, is Sunnyside, the celebrated residence of Mr. Irving the Wolfert's Roost of the old Dutch times.

At this period of the year Sunnyside generally presents a melancholy appearance, the trees being almost entirely denuded of foliage, the dry leaves lying upon the walks and lawns, and the winds playing around the yet verdant evergreens and among the bare branches with the soft, sad music peculiar to the autumn breeze. The house itself, with its quaint gables, its old fashioned ornaments and rambling wings, readily assumes a tinge of melancholy. But yesterday it appeared unusually lonely; the windows were closed, and delicacy prevented others than those connected with the family or with the necessary funeral offices from intruding upon the house of woe, or trespassing upon the tastefully laid out grounds.

At about one o'clock the funeral procession left Sunnyside, where a private religious service had been held by Dr. Creighton, the Rector of Christ Church, Tarrytown, and an intimate personal friend of the deceased. The coffin was placed in a handsome hearse, the sides of which were glazed, so that the coffin was plainly visible. The carriage containing the friends of the deceased followed.

As the procession approached the public school, the children were seen arrayed in a line upon the roadside. As the hearse passed, the boys and teachers uncovered their heads in respect to the memory of one who for years had taken an active interest in their studies.

The church, where the funeral ceremonies took place, is only a few rods from the school house, and stands on the west side of the road.
Rev. Dr. Creighton and Rev. Mr. Spencer, the officiating clergyman, met the body at the door of the church, and proceeded up the south aisle, reading the opening sentences of the Episcopal burial service.

Arrived at the chancel, the coffin was deposited before the chancel rail, while the choir sang to a Gregorian chant, the appointed anthem, "Lord let me know my end." Dr. Creighton then read the lesson from the 15th chapter of I. Corinthians, and the choir sang the verses of the 20th psalm, to the choral known as "St. Ann's."

The hymn is often sung at funerals, and was selected for the funeral of the late Bishop Wainwright.

Dr. Creighton then stated that those desiring to take a last look at the features of the deceased could do so by passing up the south aisle, crossing in front of the chancel, and leaving by the north aisle.

Nearly a thousand persons who had been unable to gain entrance to the church, availed themselves of this mournful privilege, and passed a quick though solemn procession by the remains of Washington Irving.

Among the distinguished men who took part in this token of respect, or were present at the services, were Commodore Paulding, Hamilton Fish, John A. Dix, William B. Astor, Gu- lian C. Verplanck, George Bancroft, N. P. Willis, Henry T. Tuckerman, G. P. Putnam, Evert Duyckinck, George J. Duyckinck, George Fol- son, Frederick Sanders, President King of Columbia College, and Dr. Cogswell, of the Astor Library. Al- most every inhabitant of Tarrytown was present to offer their last tribute of respect to their late friend and fellow-townsmen.

The features of Mr. Irving ap- peared very thin to those who had not seen him for some time. During the last year, however, Mr. Irving's failing health had visibly told upon his attenuated frame, and he looked very different from what he did five years ago. Then he might have been seen every Sunday in his pew in the little village church, always ready at the close of the services to greet the numerous friends that always met him by the church door. He ap- peared well and hearty—as unlike the conventional idea of a literary man as could be, and more like a well-to-do merchant or respectable alderman. Mr. Irving dressed, of course, respectably, but never ele- gantly, and he often had a peculiar shambling gait, that would attract the attention even of those who did not know him. In entering the church he usually was waylaid by a few friends, spoke a few words with them, and then passed in to his pew near the chancel, recognizing by a kindly smile, as he walked up the aisle, his various acquaintances. At other times he would visit the Sunday school, for many years under the superintendence of his intimate friend and his pall-bearer, Mr. Nathaniel B. Holmes, of Spring Hill College, Tarrytown. He always was very fond of and exceedingly popular among children, and therefore, took a lively interest in the Sunday school. He was for many years a warden of Christ Church, and on several occa- sions served as lay delegate to the Diocesan Convention. A firm though not bigoted Episcopalian, Mr. Irving loved the services of his church, and often expressed his devoted admi- ration of her liturgy. At the meeting held by the citizens of Tarrytown, the night after Mr. Irving's death, Rev. Mr. Spencer spoke of Mr. Irving's love of the church, his good- ness of heart and his susceptibility to emotional influences. He said that he had seen Mr. Irving's eyes well over with tears at the least cir- cumstances that would touch his heart. He was passionately fond of music. On the occasion of his first interview with Mr. Irving, he was expressing his interest in that glori- ous hymn of the church—the Gloria in Excelsis—and repeating the words, "Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace and good will to men," he ex- claimed, with his eyes moistened, and his voice trembling with emotion, "That is religion, Mr. Spencer; that is true religion for you."

Mr. Irving usually attended church accompanied by his nieces and other relatives.

Mr. Irving's body was enclosed in a rosewood coffin, which was embossed with heavy silver screws, and furnished on the sides with chased sil- ver handles. On the top was a sil- ver plate bearing the inscription:

WASHINGTON IRVING,
Born April 3, 1783.
Died November 28, 1859.

Wreaths of native and exotic flow- ers lay on the coffin lid. The corpse was clothed in ordinary civilian cos- tume.

THE ROUTE TO THE GRAVE

lay along a road offering most beau- tiful glimpses of land and water scenery, but now rendered peculi- arly interesting by the fact that it passes through the scenes that the pen of Mr. Irving has rendered classic.— The hearse and carriages accompanied and preceded by a large number of pedestrians, started from the church at about two o'clock, and passed up the main road, through and beyond the village. The piazzas of the houses were crowded with specta- tors, while the rocks on the wayside also served as standing points for strangers and citizens. While the procession was on its way, the bells of the various churches tolled re- sponsively.

The procession passed through the village by the monument erected last year on the spot where Maj. Andre was captured, until a sudden turn and rapid descent in the road brought the spectator in full view of one of the most delicious bits of pastoral scenery in the vicinity of New York—the brook and cove of Sleepy Hol- low, with its pond reflecting the trees upon its hilly borders, while on its opposite shore stood the celebrated Van Tassel mansion, the same to which Ichabod Crane was invited on the night of his celebrated adventure with the headless horseman. The old mill still stands, forming a prom- inent feature in the picture, and doing to this day good and active ser- vice. A few rods further and the bridge which Ichabod crossed in his furious flight, and which Irving in his tale has immortalized in the same way that Burns immortalized another bridge in his Tam O'Shanter, came in sight. It was elegantly decorated with evergreens, and black and white drapery and rosettes. Beyond this, on the opposite bank, stands the old Dutch Church, which, according to an inscription on its front, was built in 1699, by Frederick Phillips and Catharine Van Cortlandt, his wife. The Tarrytown Cemetery, which bears also the title of the Mount Pleasant Cemetery, lies to the north of this church, upon the slope of the hill. It is already thickly populated with tombstones, some of them dat- ing as far back as the year 1667.

THE GRAVE OF WASHINGTON IRVING.

Near the summit of the slope where a grove of oak and yew trees commences to crown the hill, is the burial place of the Irving family. It is a large square lot, bounded by a low fence and a thickly grown ever- green hedge. Near the center is a row of five graves, while a few feet distant is another row of five more graves, all marking the resting places of the deceased members of the Irving family. Between these two rows, and connecting them into one continuous row, is the grave of Wash- ington Irving, which, like the others, will be marked by a plain white mar- ble slab. This latest grave is very near the center of the Irving lot.

OBSEQUES AT THE GRAVE

Only a few carriages, containing the relatives of the deceased, ap- proached the grave, the others being left in the road by the old church, while the occupants walked to the place of interment. Dr. Creighton officiated, and, according to the sol- lemn form of the Episcopal service, consigned the "earth to earth, dust to dust, ashes to ashes." The scene at this moment, apart from the insepa- rable solemnity of such an occasion was one of more than ordinary in- terest.

The day was mild and balmy as at spring time, while the sun, yet high above the horizon, was veiled rather than dimmed by a film of cloud, which softened the rays that would otherwise have fallen with painful brilliancy upon the eyes of the re- verently uncovered crowd that was present. The relatives and person- al friends of the deceased were with- in the enclosure of the burial lot, while outside, and upon the various hillocks commanding a view of the scene, were many of the townspeople and strangers. Dr. Creighton, Bish- op Potter and Rev. Pierre M. Irving, stood at the head of the grave, and by them was the venerable brother of Washington Irving, Mr. Ebenezer Irving, now eighty-six years old, supported by his two daughters, the nieces whose care and affection so greatly enlivened the latter years of Washington Irving's life. Other re- lations and friends made up the group. The scene spread out before this sad assembly, though all unheeded by them, was one of singular beau- ty. Down the green hill slope, thick- ly dotted with grave stones, groups of late comers were coming slowly towards the place of interment. At the foot of the slope the old re- volutionary church, its front draped in black, while the road before it was crowded with carriages. Beyond this the smooth sheet of water that supplies the ancient Van Tassel mill dam was plainly discernable, while still farther were the village of Tar- rytown and the Hudson river, the Palisades forming a distant background. The delicate blue haze that pervaded the atmosphere mingled with the rich tints of an afternoon sun, which, as it descended, resolved itself, an hour or two later, into one of those gorgeous autumn sunsets that add such a peculiar glory to American scenery. And it was in such a place as this, on such a day, and under such circumstances, that Washington Irving, the genial author, and the loved and cherished friend and citizen, was laid quietly down to take his last sleep, among the scenes he has himself so faithfully describ- ed, by the side of his mother, and in the very spot he had but a week ago designated as the place of his final repose.

Washington Irving, as the last of the great literary men of the earlier part of the century, and probably from his personal acquaintance with the great Scottish novelist, recalls to mind the genius and career of Walter Scott. In their last days, too, there was a singular similarity. Like Scott, Irving had his home among the scenes that he particularly loved, and which he had invested with the magic of his genius, and, like Scott, he was buried amid those scenes.— It is difficult to tell whether the burial- place of Scott or of Irving is the more attractive. Beneath a fine majestic arch of Dryburgh Abbey, one of the few remains of that noble gothic edifice that has escaped the ravages of time—so near the banks of an historic Scottish stream, that the ripple of her waters can be heard from his grave—within sight of the almost enchanted-land.

"Where fair Tweed flows round holy Maryrose, And Eildon slopes down to the plain."

surrounded by decaying monuments of the mediæval grandeur, of which he has so nobly sung, they built the sarcophagus of Walter Scott. On the shores of his loved Hudson, in sight of the noble Palisades, before whose grand magnificence the mediæval monuments are but as toys, and under only the arch of oak and yew branches twenty-seven years later Mr. friend Washington Irving was laid to rest. They are now both but mere historic names. Not Ab- bey will not be oftener visited than the quiet churchyard that looks upon Sleepy Hollow and the Tappan Zee.

INCIDENTS OF WASHINGTON IRVING'S LIFE—HIS CONVERSATIONAL POW- ERS, HIS FEELINGS, HIS LOVE OF MUSIC, &c.

[From the New York Herald, 2d.]

The villagers narrate many inci- dents illustrative of the genial and kindly qualities of the deceased, whose name is constantly upon their lips, his memory is green in their hearts. He was the enemy (if such a word can be associated with such a character) of all contention and strife, in whatever form, and hence he took no prominent part in political affairs. Yet he never suffered an election day to pass, no matter how stormy and unpleasant, without going early to the polls and religiously depositing his vote; and having per- formed that duty, he straightway returned to his home. His ballot was always prepared at home, and the officious ticket distributor was invariably put aside, with the old kindly smile and a polite "Thank you, I am already provided for." I naturally inquired what ticket he voted, but, among half a dozen men who had known him for years, not one was able to answer the question.

Mr. Irving was one of the war- dens of Christ Church of which he had long been a communicant. A year or two ago the church had just under- gone some repairs of a costly char- acter, when one night some unruly boy threw a stone through the chancel window, breaking the glass and doing considerable mischief. At a vestry meeting shortly after a gentleman denounced the act, and announced that the offender had been discov- ered to be a lad whom he named—a wild youth, well known in the vil- lage as a sort of "Ike Partington." There was some talk of bringing the culprit to punishment, when Mr. Irving rose and said that as he was the senior warden any punishment to be inflicted would have to be meted out by him, and as he distinctly remem- bered that he was once a boy himself, he would have to measure the punish- ment accordingly. The matter was dropped at once, but we are assured that ever since the boys have been very careful about throwing stones in that vicinity.

Although his social conversational powers were unrivaled, Mr. Irving was not a public speaker, being very diffident, and avoided as far as pos- sible appearing at public occasions.— A year or two ago, however, when Captain Cobb, of the black Ball line, who recently died in Florida, gave the town of Tarrytown a splendid new school house, which he had built for the purpose, Mr. Irving was present at the banquet given on the occasion with numerous other distinguished gentlemen residing in the neighbor- hood. Being called upon somewhat unexpectedly he positively declined to speak, but in response to a subsequent call he made ample amends in a neat little speech, which is described to me as the gem of the occasion, abounding in the genuine Knicker- bocker humor.

ANOTHER INTERVIEW WITH MR. IR- VING.

YONKERS, Nov. 29, 1859.

REVEREND AND DEAR SIR,
My interview with Mr. Irving will ever be held by me as sacred. To say that it was most satisfactory and pleasant is to say nothing. I had, indeed known him by his books, which I have read over and over again, and never without feeling drawn to him anew; and I have look- ed forward to the possibility of a personal acquaintance with an eag- erness of hope which cannot surprise one who knows the charm of his spir- it as infused throughout his works. But, when I saw him in his own house, I felt that the chasm of years had been bridged over in some mys- tical way, and as though I had known him intimately for a long, long time.

Only last Tuesday—a week ago this very day—I saw him, and heard him speak with fervor and affection of old scenes and old friends; and now I write, overpowered with grief as well as gratitude, when I hoped to express most hearty thanks to you for leading me to that fountain of which I desired often to drink, but which has been withdrawn as soon as presented. May it be a perennial fountain in the garden of God.

How beautiful that he should have closed his life on earth just with the close of the Christian year! With the very Advent season has his im- mortal bliss begun.

I happened to mention the name of Washington Allston. It set his soul all glowing with tender, affectionate enthusiasm. To hear the great patriot so praised by the great writer, with a voice tremulous partly with infirmity but more with emotion, was something to keep, as surely as if every word had been engraven with the point of a diamond.

I do not wish to make him weary, and his cordial desire that I would call to see him again, and his ex- pressions of good will, so much more hearty than I had any right to expect, will ever be cherished as a benedic- tion. I seem to have received a part- ially blessing upon my heart and soul; how little did I then think that it would prove the very last. I had not said a word about his fame or his books; I was too busy holding com- munion with his living spirit to think at the time of his works, but I knew that he recognized me one of his thousands of admirers quite as thor- oughly as if he had spent the pre- cious time in passing high wrought encomiums. I have had my share of sorrows; sometimes in hours of deep sadness, I think that I have had more than my share; but then comes the reproving recollection of manifold and great mercies; and, certainly, the consciousness of having struck, how- ever feebly and briefly, a chord of sympathy with the heart of Wash- ington Irving, will bring to me much consolation in times of future despondency.

When I was leaving Mr. Irving I asked him to let me pluck some of the ivy leaves that adorn his house. He consented with a smile so full of kindness and tenderness, and with a tone so full of feeling, that I shall regard every leaf as more precious than gold.

WILLIAM G. DIX.

AN INDIAN'S COMMENT.—When Governor Tallmadge went out to Fond du Lac, Wisconsin, then a ter- ritory, his new home was graced by several grown up daughters. The Indians were "there and thereabouts" at the time, and frequently were met by members of the Governor's fam- ily. It was an era in female dress when the bustle was a desired acces- sion of grace and outline, but new to the aborigines. A grave old chief one day was asked what he thought of the Governor's daughters. "Pret- ty squaws, nice squaws, pity 'um backs broke." What would the old chief say now in these modern days of wide-spread crinoline?

In the English Church at Geneva, Switzerland, prayer for the Presi- dent of the United States has recent- ly been introduced.

Waiting for the Return- less.

Every such event as the expedition and fate of Sir John Franklin and his men possesses parentheses, "asides," if we may say so, that in point of interest are not inferior to the grander incidents of the great drama.

After the curious world fancies that the whole story is told, little episodes like the following are brought to light, which we find in the Philadelphia Bulletin. Renryn is an old town in the West of Eng- land, and situated only a mile from Falmouth. As the story runs, about fifteen years ago a young sailor named Johns, a native of Penryn, belonged to a coasting vessel sailing between that port and London. He was the accepted suitor of a young girl in about his own circumstances, but whose personal attractions gained the attention of more than one young man of better station. As is not to be wondered at, the young woman was a bit of a coquette, and flirted, in the absence of her accepted lover, with some of her other admirers. Among these was a dashing young fellow from Falmouth, who had once had a quarrel with young Johns, and whose attention to the girl—Miss Cook—were at first prompted by a spirit of malice to his adversary. He took her to places of amusement, rode or walked with her on Sundays, endeavored to make his attention to her as public as possible.

Rumors of this reached Johns on some of trips home but as he never saw them together, he always passed the tales by with as little attention as possible. Once, however, his vessel arrived in port on Sunday evening and her lover hastily donned his best suit and rushed off to see his lady-love. She was not at home, having gone to church. Impatiently he hurried off to the church, and near its gate met his apparently faithless sweetheart walking arm in arm with his detested Falmouth adversary.— Without waiting to meet them he turned and went on board his ship.

It was the time when the brave Franklin was forming his expedition for the exploration of the North- western Passage, and great induce- ments in the way of bounty, money and comparatively large pay were laid out to the adventurous mariners. The two towns furnished seven vol- unteers. One of these was young Johns. Stung by the seeming faith- lessness of his beloved, he had joined the daring party that were to seek fame and perhaps death, amid the un- known terrors of the North Pole.

Soon after this rash step had been taken, Johns learned that Miss Cook was still faithful to him alone. The meeting between them must have been both very sweet and bitter—sweet in the knowledge of each other's constancy—bitter in the cer- tainty that they must part, for it was now too late to retract. Even if it was possible to withdraw from this service under government, manly honor forbade a cowardly desertion of the townsmen who had volunteer- ed with him; nor would he bear to face the jeers of the people of the rival town. Besides there was some hopes of a speedy return, and the girl was somewhat proud after all of his bravery and the honor which the daring step would attach to his name.

On a bright May morning they were married in the old church of St. Gervasius, and a merry peal rang from the old square, gray tower in honor of the nuptials, for Johns was a favorite with many of the townspeo- ple, and the bride was, as we have said, somewhat of a belle of the place. The honeymoon was but of a few days duration, for the volunteers were soon ordered to join their ships.

On the 23th of May, 1845, the Erebus and Terror sailed from the river Thames with 135 souls on board; on the 26th of July in that year, the whaling ship Prince of Wales spoke them at the entrance of Lancaster Sound. That was the last time the members of the expedi- tion were ever seen by civilized men.

The wives of the explorers monthly drew half the pay of their husbands. The other half accumulated in the hands of the government until the return of the husbands, or the official notification of their deaths. Mrs. Johns drew her pay and lived at home with her parents, eagerly look- ing for the accounts of the progress of the expedition. In some time she became the mother of a boy, and in her new duties she passed the time less heavily.

Months rolled on to years, but still no tidings came of the fatal vessels. Expedition after expedition went in search of the missing men, but all returned with the same story of pri- vation, danger and want of success.— With painful eagerness the wacher now grasped the weekly London newspaper in search of news of the lost ones, and earnestly besought the opinions of skillful navigators as to the chances of their safety. Hope, at last, seemingly died out in all hearts save hers.—She clung to the last straw.

Those who climbed the steep of Pendennis Castle eight or nine years since, may have seen on Sunday afternoons a comely woman, clad in plain but neat dress, seated on an emburase of a battery, gazing out on the waters of the English Chan- nel, waiting and watching for the vessels that never came. Her little boy skipped about picking the daisies and butter-cups that spangled the grassy slopes.

At length hope died out of all hearts, even hers. But still she lived on her quiet life. The visits to the heights were no longer made, but friends saw that the absent one lived in her thoughts. Then came the tid- ings brought by Dr. Rae, convinc- ing every one that the sad drama of life had actually been played out on those everlasting ice-fields. Govern- ment, which had continued the pay to the bereaved wives, was com- pelled to officially announce the unfortunate explorers as dead. The half pay which had accumulated in its coffers was now paid over to the representatives of the deceased, and future pay was stopped. To Mrs. Johns the sum paid over amounted to about a hundred pounds sterling. Now at last the widow's weeds were put on and the fatherless lad was dressed in mourning. When we last heard of them—about a year since—they were still living in their native town, pursuing the old course of life. The widow eked out her little fund by sewing and remained still constant to her first love.

Such is the story as we find it, and it impresses us with the pleasant truth that there are more spirits like Lady Franklin's than the world recognizes; spirits that disguised in poverty, and moving in humble walks, that are as rich in faith and hope and deathless love as Lady Franklin.

ADVANTAGE OF LARGE NEWSPA- PERS.—An editor called on one of the publishers of a certain paper and began telling him how grateful for the patronage hitherto bestowed on his enterprise, he was going to in- crease the size of his paper. "That's right," exclaimed he of the goose and shears, "that's right. I am glad of it. Your paper was too small to wrap a coat in it!" The editor gasped for breath.

JUDGE KINNEY.—During the heat of the recent canvass, an article re- flecting severely upon the official character of Judge Kinney, while Chief Justice of Utah, was copied into this Journal from the Atlantic Monthly. We have recently met several intelligent gentlemen from that Territory, and we have become satisfied, that the article referred to, did great injustice to the Judge.— Those gentlemen complained bitterly of the character of the officials sent to that Territory, by this; and the preceding National Administration, but they all united in saying that Judge Kinney was generally popular with the people of Utah and was re- garded by them, as an honorable man, and an upright Judge. This much we regard as due to the Judge, and we cheerfully say it.—Republican.

I and Jenny Davis.

On a sunny summer morning,
Early, as the dew was dry,
Up the hill I went a berrying:
Need I tell you—tell you why?
Farmer Davis had a daughter,
And it happened that I knew,
On each sunny morning, Jenny,
Up the hill went berrying too.

Lonely work is picking berries,
So I joined her on the hill;
Jenny, dear, said I, "your basket's Quite too large for one to fill."
So we staid—we two—to fill it,
Jenny talking—I was still—
Leading where the hill was steep,
Picking berries up the hill.

"This is up hill work," said Jenny:
"So is life," said I, "shall we Climb it up alone, or Jenny,
Will you come and climb with me?"
Redder than the blushing berries
Jenny's cheeks a moment grew,
While without delay, she answered,
"I will come and climb with you."

[From Once a Week.]

How an Advertiser
got a Wife.

"Tobacco is the tomb of Love," writes a modern novelist of high standing, but with every respect for his authority, I beg to say it was quite the contrary in my case.

Twenty-one years ago, I was sitting by my fire-side, totting up innumerable pages of my bachelor's house-keeping-book, taking exercise in arithmetic on long columns of "petty cash"—comprising items of carrots and bath bricks, metal tacks and mutton chops—until, tired and wearied,
I arrived at the sum total, and jerked the book on the mantel-piece.
Nearly at the same time I placed my hand in the pocket of my dressing-gown, drew out a leather case, and lit a principle. Well, having lit the principle, I placed my feet on the fender and sighed, exhausted by my long job of domestic accounts. I was then in business—twas a small wholesale business then, 'tis a large one now—yet one morning's totting of carrots and bath-bricks, of metal tacks and mutton chops, would tire me a thousand times more than twenty-four hours of honest ledger work.
I sighed, not from love, but from labor; for, to tell you the truth, I had never been in love. Is this to go on forever? thought I, as I took my third whiff, and looked dreamily through the thin smoke as it ascended between my fingers and a glass chimney capture of Gibraltar which hung over the chimney-piece.

Am I to spend my prime in totting
up pattnips, and computing carrots, and controlling washing bills? I sighed again, and in the act, off flew
the button of my neck band, as tho'
some superior power had seasonably sent the accident to remind me of my helplessness.

The button settled the business;
though, as it slipped down inside my shirt, and passed with its mother-o'- pearl coldness over my heart, it for a moment threatened to chill my matrimonial resolution. I pitied my own lonely state, and pity, we know, is kin to love. But how was the matter to be accomplished? Most men at my age would already have adjusted their inclination to some object; so that having made up their mind and counted the cost, little more would have remained to be done than to decide upon the day, and lay hold upon the license. This, however, was not the case with me. I had been too much occupied, too idle, or too indolent to devote the time to make the effort to "form an attachment." It was through no disinclination or difficulty to be pleased; for had any young lady of moderately agreeable powers taken the trouble,
she might have married me long ere this. I should even have been grateful to her for taking the trouble off my hands, but I was too bashful
to adopt the initiative.

I was a bashful man. This weakness came from the same cause as my Uncle Toby's, namely, a want of acquaintance with female society,
which want arose from another cause
in my case—namely, too close an application to business.

Accordingly I thought of an advertisement, yet with no practical design of doing business, but, as I persuaded myself, for joke. So I scratched with a pencil on the back of a letter the following:

Wanted a Wife.—None but principles need apply. The advertiser does not require cash, but only a companion. He is six-and-twenty, and tired of single, he thinks he can settle down to married life. As men go, he believes he has a moderate share of temper, and want of time is his only reason for having recourse to the newspapers. He has enough means for himself and a second party, and is willing to treat at once. He is quite aware that a great many attempts to convert his honest intentions into an extravagant joke will be made, but he warns all rash intruders. If he finds a man hardy enough to make sport of his affections, he will thrash him—if a woman, he will forgive her. He has a heart for the sincere; a horsewhip

for the impertinent. In either case, all applications will be promptly attended to, if addressed to P. P., to the office of this paper.

I felt proud of my composition, and puffed away my principle with a vague glee and anticipation of something coming out of it. I had no very great idea that anything but fun would result; and I certainly had not the slightest notion of involving myself in a personal collision with any one. Still, the presentiment that it was not destined to be all a barren joke pressed upon me. On Saturday the advertisement appeared, and I heard its style canvassed
by all my friends; and it was jokingly suggested by more than one that I was the domestically destitute individual who put it forth.

On Monday morning I sent a boy to the newspaper office for P. P.'s letters. I expected he might be followed by some curious and inquisitive persons; so I told him on his way back to call at a bachelor neighbor's of mine for a book. The trick told. The lad was followed by some persons who never lost sight of him until they run him to my friend's,
and then they went back and announced that he was the advertiser.
I thus discharged in full one or two practical jokes which my neighbor had played upon me. The answers were of the usual character—several seeking to elicit my name, and still more suggesting places of meeting,
where was to exhibit myself with a flower in my button-hole and a white handkerchief in my hand. One only looked like business. It was from a lady, who proposed an interview in a neighboring city, about forty miles north. She said there was something so frank and straight-forward in my advertisement, that she was convinced it was real, and she could rely upon my keeping her name secret, if after we met nothing came of the meeting. She would, therefore, see me at the _____, at
_____, on a certain day, and if mutual approbation did not follow the interview, why there was no harm
done.

Most people would have put down
this as a trap to give me a journey for nothing. I did not. A presentiment compelled me to accept and keep the engagement.

This was in the old coaching days,
when a man had time to make an acquaintance in forty miles, not as now, when you are at your journey's end before you have looked round
your company in a railway carriage.
There were but two inside—myself
and a pleasant, talkative, honest-faced elderly gentleman. Shy and timid in female society, I was yet esteemed animated and agreeable enough amongst my own sex. We had no trouble, therefore, in making ourselves agreeable to one another;
so much so, that as the coach approached G_____, and the old gentleman learned that I meant to stop
there that night he asked me to waive ceremony and have a cup of tea with him after I had dined at my hotel—
My "fair engagement" was not till next day, and as I liked the old gentleman, I accepted his offer.

After my pint of sherry, I brushed my hair, and went in search of my coach companion and my promised cup of tea. I had no difficulty in finding him out, for he was a man of substance and some importance in the place. I was shown into the drawing-room. My old friend received me heartily, and introduced me to his wife and daughters. "All spinsters, sir," said he, "young ladies whom an indiscriminating world seems disposed to leave upon my hands."

"If we don't sell, papa," said the eldest, who, with her sisters, seemed to reflect her father's fun, "it is not for want of puffing, for all your introductions are advertisements."

At the mention of this last word,
I felt a little discomposed, and almost regretted my engagement for the next day, when that very night, perhaps, my providential opportunity had arrived.

I need not trouble my readers with all our sayings and doings during tea, suffice it to say that I found them a very pleasant, friendly family, and was surprised to find forgot all my shyness and timidity, encouraged by their good-tempered ease and conversation. They did not inquire whether I was married or single, for where there were five young unmarried daughters, the question might seem invidious. I, however, in the freedom of that moment, volunteered

the information of my bachelorhood;
I thought I had no sooner communicated the fact than the girls passed round a glance of arch intelligence from one to the other. I cannot tell you how odd I felt at the moment—
My sensations were between pleasure and confusion, as a suspicion crossed my mind, and helped, I felt,
to color my cheek. Presently, however, the eldest with an assumed indifference which cost her an effort,
asked where I was staying.

"At the _____ hotel," I answered
with some embarrassment.

It was with difficulty they restrained a laugh; they bit their lips,
and I had no longer a suspicion—I was certain. So, after having some music, when I rose to depart I mustered courage, as I bid them good bye, to say aside to the eldest:

"Shall P. P. consider this the interview?"
A blush of conscious guilt, I should rather say innocence, told me that I had sent my random arrow to the right quarter; so I pressed the matter no further at that moment, but I did her hand.

I remained in at my hotel next day, until an hour after the appointed time, but no one made their appearance. "Then," thought I, brushing
my hair and adjusting my cravat,
"since the mountain will not come to Mahomet, Mahomet must go to the mountain;" so I walked across to my old friends. The young ladies were all in. The eldest was engaged with some embroidery at the window. I had, therefore, an opportunity, as I leaned over the frame, to whisper:

"S. S. is not punctual."
The crimson in her face and neck
was now so deep, that a skeptic himself would no longer doubt. I need say no more; that evening in her father's garden, she confessed that she and her sisters had conspired to bring me up to G____—on a fool's errand, never meaning, of course, to keep the engagement.

"Then," said I, "since you designed to take me in, you must consent to make me happy."
"And what did she say, papa?"
asks my second daughter, who is now looking over my shoulder as I write.

"Why, you little goose, she promised to be your mamma, and she has kept her word."

DEATH OF AN AGED LADY.—Mrs.
Sarah Taylor, widow of Charles Taylor, aged 96 years, died in Chester, Pa., on the 12th inst., after a short illness. The Chester Repub- lican says:

At the time of the battle of Brandywine, Mrs. Taylor resided in the family of Gideon Gilpin, a member of the Society of friends, who lived near Chadd's Ford, at that period.—
After the engagement, Gilpin's house was entered and pillaged by the British soldiers. The owner, being a non-combatant, the outrages upon his property was submitted to without resistance. His dwelling afterwards became the headquarters of some of the British officers. Mrs. Taylor took an active part in the stirring events of that memorable day—furnished food to the Americans, and assisted in dressing the wounds of those who were disabled in the contest. She had two brothers in the American army—John and Francis—the latter of whom was wounded. She distinctly recollected many of the incidents of the battle, and used to relate them with great minuteness to those who visited her.

The Tennessee Legislature has adopted
a resolution introduced by Mr.
Richardson, declaring that they regard the Southern Pacific Railroad as a necessity of the age; and that we commend it and its extension from El Paso, through Arizona, to the Pacific ocean, to the favorable consideration of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, so as to obtain therefor such countenance and aid as may, within due constitutional limits, be properly conferred.

The mansion in which William Penn, the great peacemaker, passed his days, after founding the "City of Brotherly Love," is situated
about a mile above Bristol, Delaware.
It is an old, quaint looking building
with its gable ends made the fashion of several centuries past. It stands looking forth as a monument of the past age, connecting it with the present.

It is a waste of raw materials to put five dollar's worth of beaver on ten cents' worth of brains.

Wilkes' Spirit says of the fight between Heenan and Sayers, to come off next June: "Great numbers of sporting men are already preparing to go over to England at the proper time to see this champion battle; and already, with a view of defraying their expenses the betting among them is beginning. We have already seen six thousand dollars invested in two bets, and have heard of numerous small conflicting sums, ranging from the amount of one hundred dollars down to ten. One of the bets of which we are specially cognizant is a wager of $5,000
a side, made by two gentlemen well known in the turf circles of this country;
in fact, by 'Larkin' on the one side, and the proprietor of the Fashion Course on the other, the latter taking Sayers, and the former Heenan. Five hundred of this sum is up; $2,000 a side more is to be put up between the 15th of April and 1st of May, and the remaining $2,500 a side is to be staked on the day of the fight. The other $1,000 bet is made between 'Larkin,' and the former proprietor of 'Lantern.'"

TERRIBLE RETALIATION.—A letter
from Algeria states that the French soldiers taken prisoners on the 21st of August were all burnt alive by the Moors, and the French troops were burning to revenge the outrage. These troops should be burning with shame to think that their countrymen were the first to set the example of this horrid barbarity to the Moors in 1845. History will not forget to chronicle that Col. Pelissier, who has since been a Marshal of France,
and is now the Duke of Malakoff, roasted alive a large party of Arabs in a cave
where they fled for shelter.

Sheridan beautifully said: "Women govern us, let us render them perfect: the more they are enlightened, so much the more shall we be.
On the cultivation of the mind of women depends the wisdom of men.—
It is by women that nature writes on the hearts of men."

The proprietor of a town site in Wisconsin advertises his lots for sale in this wise: "The town of _____
and the surrounding country, is the most beautiful the God of nature ever made. The scenery is celestial—divine; also, two wagons to sell, and a yoke of steers."

A story is going the rounds, of a party of young ladies who were caught in a shower, and had the color washed from their cheeks. A young lady at our elbow thinks the color in some of the gentlemen's cheeks will not be washed out with water at present.

A man died of apoplexy the other day in Michigan. The next day the coroner held an inquest, when the following verdict was returned:
"Died from a visitation of one beef-steak, eight cold potatoes, and a fried pie."

Obadiah thinks the "Tree of Knowledge" was the birch tree, tho' twigs of which have done more to make a man acquainted with arithmetic, than all the members of the vegetable kingdom combined.

It may sound like a paradox, yet
the breaking both an army's wings
is a pretty sure way to make it fly.

Love Me Much, and Love Me Long.

BY MRS. M. W. STATTON.

"Love me little, love me long,"
That may do for book and song,
But for woman's fond heart—never;
She loves deeply and forever.

Trusting all her soul's devotion
On Love's wild, uncertain ocean—
Hoarding dream, nor hope, nor prayer,
But your image mingles there.

Little knows her woman's heart
Who deems her half content with part—
Content with a divided treasure—
Wood by rule, and loved by measure.

Love her wholly—love her ever—
Love her thus, or from her sever.
Ere her heart has twined around thee,
Ere she hears the hour she found thee.

The sudden love may burn to waste,
And sudden vows, repent their haste;
So let it be, ere thou dost bring
A cool and cautious offering.

Or in your poverty or wealth—
Or in your sickness, or in health—
High on the pinnacle of fame,
Or in the lowest depths of shame.

Such the love that she would gain;
All cooler feeling comes in vain,
Or, coming, breaks a blissful spell,
And true love weeps her last farewell.

When hope is young, and life is new,
And pleasures many, sorrows few,
We lightly meet and lightly part,
With many a fond and faithful heart.

The following letter from Ex-President Polk, was read at the great Union Demonstration, at Boston, on the 7th of December:

CONCORD, N. H.,
Dec. 7, 1859.

GENTLEMEN: I am honored by the reception of your letter of the 3d inst., informing me that "it is proposed that citizens of Massachusetts, who honor and cherish the Union, who mean to maintain the Constitution of the United States, and faithfully to carry out all its requirements and obligations, assemble at Faneuil Hall, on Thursday, the 8th day of December instant," and inviting me to be present on that occasion.

Twenty-five years ago one would have asked incontinently, upon reading a letter like that before me, "What are the dangers which threaten the Union? Where are the men who do not honor and cherish that Union? Who do not mean to maintain the Constitution of the United States, and faithfully to carry out all its requirements and obligations?" Could we not then, each for himself, have promptly answered—the dangers, if they exist, are too remote, and the men too inconsiderable in numbers, and too wild and extravagant in their principles and purposes, which they profess, to make them the cause of even serious consideration, much less of apprehension and disquietude.

How is it to-day? How is it to be to-morrow, when patriotic hearts will beat in unison in the old cradle of Liberty, and patriotic lips will repeat the sentiments and doctrines which were enunciated there more than eighty years ago, while the men of Virginia were preparing their crude but trusty weapons, not especially to protect their own borders, which have now been ruthlessly invaded in violation of all law, human and divine, but to come to Massachusetts and mingle their blood with that of our fathers in defence of the common cause.

Undisputed requirements of the constitution, affecting the rights, the security of life and property of the sons of Virginia's Revolutionary men, are set at naught. Lessons inculcating disobedience to such requirements have been scattered broadcast in our community, and have borne their fruits, not merely in the exhibition of an insurrectionary spirit, but in an actual invasion of a sister State by an armed organization, the objects of which are not disguised. This is no all. The invasion and the overt act of treason and murder, are openly justified and applauded at large meetings of men and women in your midst.

This is a sad truth, but not disheartening. It may be well that circumstances have occurred to arouse us from our lethargy, and to compel us to open our eyes, as if from the delusion of a dream, to the nearness and magnitude of impending calamities. It is comparatively safe to look dangers in the face, and meet them on the advance, but fatal to be appalled by them.

I repeat that the aspect of affairs, dark as it confessedly is, still is not disheartening, because I believe there are in New England, and throughout the Middle and Northwestern States, multitudes of conscientious and patriotic citizens, moved, it may be at this moment, by sentiments differing widely from those which will animate you to-morrow, but who, nevertheless, would not wilfully and deliberately shake a single column which sustains the fabric of our existing institutions—multitudes who have been misled upon the question of duty and personal obligations, and who now, when they have practical illustration, drawn in blood, of the teachings to which they have listened, and to which they have given their assent, will pause, long enough at least, to take counsel of intelligent reason.

You, upon the soil of Massachusetts, where the first blood of the Revolution was shed, and where Washington took command of the Army in one of the darkest periods in our country's history, cannot gaze listlessly upon the gathering clouds, and will not bow tamely before the coming storm. We may all have regarded with too much indifference the swelling tide of reckless fanaticism, but we are not too late to breast it now. If honest men, who really think the Union worth preserving, will stand forth in the majesty and strength of patriotism and law, and with united purpose and becoming energy, they can and will roll that tide back, to the dismay and discomfiture of all conspirators against the public peace and the integrity of the sacred bond which holds us a united people.

I am glad to perceive that your meeting is to be composed of citizens of various parties. The high resolve and the solemn duty to which I have just adverted rise above the range of thoughts and motives which ordinarily connect themselves with political organizations and party success. If we are true to ourselves—if we revere the memory, or appreciate the services of our fathers—we shall forget, in the exigency of this crisis, that there is, or ever has been, such thing as party in the ordinary acceptance of the term. At all events we will forget it, until, through our steady, united efforts, we see the authority of the Constitution vindicated, and the Union reposing securely upon its old foundations.

You are right in assuming that this is no time for hesitancy; no time for doubting, halting, half-way professions, or, indeed, for mere professions of any kind. It is a time for resolute purpose, to be followed by decisive, consistent action.

Shall the fundamental law of the land be obeyed, not with evasive reluctance, but in good fidelity? Have we the power to enforce obedience to it, and will we exercise that power? If so, then may we continue, to enjoy the multiplied and multiplying blessings of the peerless inheritance which has been transmitted to us. If otherwise, fanaticism has not mistaken the significance of its emblem—the national flag with the Union down. That has waved through three foreign wars, with the Union up—cheering the hearts of brave men, on sea and land, wherever its folds have unrolled in the smoke of battle! How many of our countrymen, as they have seen it floating from the mast-head, in a foreign port, or giving its ample sweep to the breeze over a Consular office, have proudly and exultingly exclaimed: "I am an American citizen, and there is the ensign which commands for me respect and security, wherever throughout the wide world I may roam, or wherever I may choose temporarily to dwell!"

How one would shut his eyes, and cover his face in shame and sorrow, if he believed he was destined to see his flag when that flag will float no more. And yet if agitators and conspirators can have their way, it must go down in darkness and blood. In a Republic like ours, law alone upholds it, and when that loses its power all human power to save is lost. If such overwhelming disaster to humanity is to overtake us, I, for one, will not try to peer through the darkness and blackness, or to foreknow the end.

Let us act calmly and deliberately, without passion and without acrimony. Let us take no hasty or narrow view of the causes which have produced the dangers we would meet, and, if possible, avert. It is not the recent invasion of Virginia which should awaken our strongest apprehension, but the teachings, still vehemently persisted in, from which it sprung, with the inevitable necessity which evolves the effect from the cause.

So, again, it is to be remembered that those who boldly approve and applaud the acts of treason and murder perpetrated within the limits of Virginia, are not the most dangerous enemies of the Constitution and the Union. Subtle, crafty men, who, passing by duties and obligations, habitually appeal to sectional prejudices and passions, by denouncing the institutions and people of the South, and thus inflame the Northern mind to the pitch of resistance to the clear provisions of the fundamental law—who, under plausible pretences, addressed to those prejudices and passions, pass local laws designed to evade Constitutional obligations, are really and truly, whether they believe it or not, the men who are hurrying us upon swift destruction.

Your repudiation of the ethical and political teachings which inspire this line of conduct will, I am sure, be pronounced in tones so earnest that no man can mistake their import. You will show, on your part, readiness to give to fellow citizens of other States such just legislation by Congress as shall provide for the punishment, not only of actual invasion, but for the setting on foot of armed expeditions, and thus do what you may effectually to secure, by constitutional enactments, each State against violence from any other. I shall hope that your meeting will awaken a spirit which will lead Massachusetts and Virginia to grasp again reciprocally the hand of affectionate sympathy and support—of love and honor—as they did in 1776, when, as the elder and more powerful of the colonies, they made up the issue of blood against the power of an unjust Parliament. Why should it not be so? Is there any cause of alienation on our part, which did not exist at the formation of the Government? When have the people of the South invaded our territory, slain our people or conveyed away our property? Why should not the authority of New Hampshire honor and cherish the authority of Mississippi? Are they not each sovereign, but yet are they not bound up together in the enduring bond of a common country? To establish upon a firm footing these relations between all the States, what is required but cordial, loyal, manly recognition and enforcement, in spirit and in act, of all the requirements of the compact entered into by the fathers who have passed to their reward?

Can it be that there is, among a large portion of our people, North or South, a settled purpose to accept the benefits, but deny the burdens of the Constitution? Have all sentiments of patriotism and honor perished together? If that time is come, or you discern its approach, then indeed, should you, who desire to live under this Constitution, expounded by the august tribunal into whose charge our fathers gave its exposition, raise the voice of warning, and save, if it be possible, the voice of woe. But it has not come, and it is still in your power to say it shall not. There is no inevitable, irresistible impulse hurrying it forward.

I deny, in the name of all that is most sacred and precious in our inheritance, that there is an element of "irrepressible conflict" between the Southern and Northern members of this confederation. The doctrine is as unsound and untrue as it is fearful. It is contradicted by the unbroken experience of the first fifty years of our history. It would have been the price of the loss of reputation for life to have uttered it while the men who fought the battles of the Revolution, and framed the Constitution, were yet alive. No! It has not come, and with the blessing of God upon the exertions of good and patriotic men, it will never be nearer.

I have faith in the power of your efforts, my fellow-citizens—faith that your example, in this relation, will be followed, and your action imitated, not only in other parts of Massachusetts, but by citizens of other States, who appreciate the blessings which the Constitution has conferred upon them, and who, come what may, intend, on their native soil, and with their children around them, to claim its protection and uphold its authority. I have faith, above all, that the continued favor of the God of our fathers, who watched over our feeble political beginnings, who preserved us through the innumerable perils of the struggle for nationality, will yet make the wrath of man subservient to the peace and durability of this Union.

With thanks for your remembrance of me on this occasion, and regrets that it is impossible for me to meet you in Faneuil Hall, I am, gentlemen,

Very truly, your friend,
FRANKLIN PIERCE.

A Miser.

Michael Baird, (or Bear as he was sometimes called,) who lived near Little York, Pennsylvania, was a miserable miser. His father left a valuable farm of five hundred acres in the vicinity of York, with some farming and household articles. He kept a tavern for a number of years—married and raised four children. He accumulated an immense estate which he reserved so tenaciously that he never afforded a dollar for the education of his children. He was never known to lay out one dollar in cash for any article he might be in want of; he would either do without it, or find some person who would barter with him for something he could not conveniently sell for the money. He farmed largely and kept a large distillery, which he supplied entirely with his own grain. He kept a team for the conveyance of whisky and flour to Baltimore, where, when he could not for money sell at a price to suit him, he bartered for necessities for his family and tavern.

In this way he amassed an estate worth four hundred thousand dollars. Such was his attachment to money that he was never known to credit a single dollar to any man. Upon the best mortgage or other security that could be given he would not lend a cent. He never invested one dollar in public funds, neither would he keep the notes of any bank longer than he could get them changed. He deposited his specie in a large iron chest, until it would hold no more. He then provided a strong iron hooped barrel, which he also filled. After his death his strong boxes yielded two hundred and thirty thousand dollars in gold and silver.

The cause of his death was as remarkable as the course of his life. A gentleman from Virginia offered him $12 a bushel for 110 bushels of clover seed; but he would not sell it for less than thirteen dollars, and they did not agree. The seed was afterward sent to Philadelphia, where it was sold for seven dollars per bushel, and brought in the whole five hundred and fifty dollars less than the Virginian had offered for it. On receiving an account of his sale, he walked through his farm, went to his distillery, and gave directions to his people. He then went to his wagon-house and hanged himself.—Belmont Rep.

ANOTHER GRACE DARLING.—A Norfolk paper thus records the heroic deed of a little girl in that city:

It appears that a few days ago, while the weather was quite cold and the wind blowing quite a gale, a small sail boat was seen approaching the Matthews shore. When about one hundred yards off, a squall of wind capsized the frail boat, and one of the men was thrown headlong into the angry billows. This accident was witnessed by little Louisa M. Hudgins, who was at the moment watching the approaching boat from her father's window, when she saw the struggling form of a man in the water.

She rushed hastily from the house to the shore; divested herself of her shoes and hose, and waded out to a canoe which was secured to a stake a short distance from the shore. This she hastily paddled to the relief of the drowning man, and reached him in time to save his life. She then, with the assistance of the other men, succeeded in getting him into her boat, and paddled him safely to the shore. We understand that when she reached the shore and found herself sans bonnet, sans shoes, and sans stockings, her maidenly modesty, which had been overcome by her heroism, returned, and she blushed scarlet to find herself in this predicament before two men. But she had no need to be ashamed; the deed was a noble one! worthy of a Spartan mother! and we take great pleasure in chronicling it.

THE CHARLESTON CONVENTION.—OHIO FOR DOUGLAS.—In seventeen Congressional Districts, the delegates elected to the Charleston Democratic Convention are understood to be unanimously for Douglas for the Presidency. Four districts remain to be heard from, which have probably chosen Douglass delegations.—Nine of the seventeen district conventions passed resolutions directly instructing the delegates to vote for Douglas.—Cin. Com.

AN ENGLISH DISCOVERY.—The English press is continually telling us something of affairs in this country, of which, but for it, we should remain profoundly ignorant. A Liverpool paper commenting on the Harper's Ferry outbreak, solemnly speaks of "Old Brown" as a "colored chieftain."

Rev. Antoniette K. Brown Blackwell preached for Theodore Parker's congregation in Boston a short time since. She took the following for her text: "When I was a child I spake as a child, understood as a child, I thought as a child, but when I became a man I put away childish things." The audience listened at the application of the text to the preacher. But Antoniette didn't see the point of the joke.

The latest feminine fashion is a diamond ring worn outside of the glove, on the little finger of the left hand, to which is attached a fine gold chain, terminating with another ring, through which a dainty lace handkerchief is passed. The effect is stunning, but would be a good deal more so if they should attach a fan parasol, two or three band boxes and other articles of female equipment also.

"A YANKEE TRICK."—The Philadelphia Inquirer (Opposition in its politics,) says:

A firm in Boston advertise cloth made of cotton cultivated entirely by free labor. The Quakers are said to have been hitherto the chief purchasers of free labor cotton goods, but there are others who begin to prefer an article untaunted by slavery. We think it quite likely that the whole trick is a Boston notion and a Yankee trick to induce anti-slavery people to purchase goods exclusively of the firm which so advertise.

HORRIBLE DOMESTIC TRAGEDY.—The Springfield (Mass.) Republican of Saturday gives the following particulars of an attempt to murder a wife in Southwick, Mass., alluded to in the telegraphic dispatches:

On Thursday afternoon, the 19th inst., a daughter of Henry Holcomb, of Southwick, upon returning home from school about 5 o'clock, found her father and mother, whom she had left at noon, absent from home, and the house vacant. Supposing that they had gone to a remote part of the town on a visit, she passed the night, unsuspecting, with a neighboring relative. On Friday morning a neighbor calling at the house about 8 o'clock, was attracted by the groans of some person in the cellar.

Upon going into the cellar, the wife of Holcomb was found lying in one corner, weltering in blood and nearly senseless. Upon her head were found five or six dreadful wounds, the scalp being torn and lacerated, and a piece of it found upon the cellar floor. At a distance of about two rods from Mrs. Holcomb, was found a large club, resembling a piece of scantling, with traces of bloody hands upon one end, and marks of gore and bits of hair upon the other. Upon examining the bed-room of the parties, the clothes worn by Holcomb, the husband, the day previous, were found on the floor, with blood upon the shirt and pants indicating that he murdered his wife, as he supposed, and then changed his clothes and fled.

Holcomb is the son of Hon. Amasa Holcomb, of Southwick, and is about 35 years of age, and has hitherto sustained an excellent reputation. He was last seen at his own house about 3 o'clock on Thursday afternoon, in company with his wife, and apparently in good nature. The assault probably occurred between that hour and 5 o'clock.

The Republican of Tuesday gives further particulars concerning the unfortunate affair: Mrs. Holcomb, after two days of insensibility from the terrible wounds inflicted by her husband, rallied on Sunday, and asked and received food. On Monday she was still better, eating crackers and drinking tea, and having a good pulse. Strong hopes are now entertained that she will survive, and both herself and his own family express the wish that the husband, who fled, under the supposition that he had succeeded in killing her, will come home. The Press is desirous to herald this fact, in the hope that in his refuge he may see and obey the call.

Mrs. Holcomb converses with her friends with apparent intelligence, but gives as yet few particulars of the assault upon her from her husband, and these agree with the theory so obviously suggested by the circumstances of her condition. He struck her first with his fist, knocked her into the cellar, and then beat and banged her head against the wall and a piece of scantling until she was insensible, and he supposed her dead. She does not yet describe the immediate occasion of this terrible and wicked assault, but there is little doubt in the family as to what it was. It was her weakness, probably her insanity, to be jealous of her husband, and every courtesy, every attention he offered to other women was the cause of much unhappiness to her, and drew forth provoking taunts and attacks from her lips.

Detaining the Locomotive.

We heard the other day of an incident connected with the return of some of our Lafayette representatives from the late St. Louis Fair, which, as it amused us, may amuse some of our readers. The Fair was over; the Lafayette county party set their faces homeward, and having procured tickets, had their baggage checked, and taken leave of St. Louis friends, seated themselves at the time for starting in one of the cars on the Pacific Railroad. But on looking round and counting noses it was discovered that one of their number, whom we shall designate as C., was absent.

Fortunately some cause of delay detained the train beyond the usual hour, and after the lapse of some ten or fifteen minutes Mr. C. made his appearance, puffing and blowing, carpet sack in hand, and seated himself among his friends. "I was afraid I had been left!" he said as soon as he had sufficiently recovered breath. "It is past the regular time for leaving, isn't it? What in the world is the matter?" "Why," replied one of the party, "it is past the hour, and we would have been gone some time ago, but you see we were waiting for you." "I wonder!" ejaculated C. "You had better go and tell the conductor you have come aboard," pursued the gentleman who had before spoken. C., being far more familiar with crops and stock than with the manners and customs of the railroad travel, (albeit he will have the cars running very near his residence ere long,) nothing doubting, and immediately arose and sought out the conductor. That official was busy attending to some duty: "Mr. Conductor, I am here," remarked C. The official only looked at him vacantly, and went on with his business. "I say, Conductor, I am aboard now, and you can go ahead," again said our friend, laying his hand on his shoulder. The Conductor turned upon him savagely: "Who the hell cares whether you've come aboard or not—you must be crazy, sir!" C., faintly murmuring "Well, I wonder!" rejoined the rest of the party, and long ere he reached Lexington discovered that he had been sold.—Lexington Expositor.

THE VALLEY TAN.

STEPHEN DEWOLFE, Editor.

Wednesday, Jan. 25, 1860.

The Eastern Mail arrived yesterday about 2 o'clock p.m. By it we received papers as late as the 31st December. Advices from Washington have been received up to the 30th. No Speaker has yet been elected. The President sent in his annual message to Congress on the 27th of December. It is a lengthy document, and our paper was so far advanced for the press when the mail came in, as to preclude its insertion in our present issue. We have delayed its publication for a day, however, in order to insert a synopsis of the message, which we found in one of our Exchanges.

Mr. Buchanan is entirely silent about Utah matters. We have often heard that he was a little sore over the great feat that he performed in sending his "Peace Commissioners" here, and in thrusting an unsought pardon upon a people in open rebellion against the government. The result has proved that his policy in so doing was as short sighted as it was unworthy the dignity and honor of the government. In his message last year he spoke of the restoration of order in Utah, but after a year's experience of the "order" and fealty to government and law which exists among the saloons, the President, without the ingenuously to retract a mistaken opinion, or to admit the error of a line of policy once pursued, passes over in silence the evidence of continued insubordination which exists in this Territory, and the insecurity of life here, to such as fall within the ban of the ecclesiastical hierarchy, that rules with more than despotic tyranny, those that profess faith in the ridiculous and blasphemous pretensions which they assume.

Perhaps, after all, the President was right to remain silent, and to ignore or appear to ignore the facts which must have been brought to his knowledge. He might otherwise have been compelled to stuff himself, and this would be a sad predicament indeed, for a President, and one that Mr. Buchanan evidently did not intend to be entrapped into. But the facts in regard to Utah were too palpable and glaring to be wholly disregarded, so the President shifts the responsibility of noticing them on the Secretary of War, who, in his report accompanying the message, makes some very wholesome comments and recommendations about this Territory. We insert that portion of Secretary Floyd's report which relates to Utah, elsewhere in our paper.

Secretary Floyd, it will be seen, pitches in to the "Saints" most vigorously—declares it as his opinion, "that the preservation of right and justice, through the means of any jurisdiction, known or recognized by the people of the United States, is impossible in that (this) Territory. It is governed, practically, by a system which is in total disregard of the laws or constitution of the land. The laws of the Mormon Church, and the will of the hierarchy are alone potential there. Beyond a mere outward show of acquiescence in federal authority, they are as irresponsible to it as any foreign nation." These words certainly indicate a returning consciousness on the part of the Secretary of War, if not in the President, as to the true state of things in Utah. If they are taken as an evidence that a different line of policy will be pursued towards those who set law and government equally at defiance, they are words fitly spoken; if not, then our government, while admitting the existence of wrongs and crimes of a heinous character, admits also its weakness in letting these wrongs and crimes go unpunished. But wouldn't it be remarkable if this administration should arouse to anything like firm and decisive action after pandering so long to a spirit of rebellion and revolt?

The California Mail arrived late yesterday evening. By it dates to January 1st have been received from San Francisco, and to Dec. 13th from Washington and Oregon. All things are quiet, and the news is unimportant.

ANOTHER SALE.—Messrs. Miller, Russell & Co. sold, during the past week, two-thirds of their entire stock of goods in this city, amounting to forty thousand dollars or upwards, to Mr. Thomas Box. The stock sold embraced equal proportions of the different varieties of goods which Miller, Russell & Co. had on hand. The gentle merchants here are evidently preparing to "toddle."

Mr. Preston, United States Minister to Spain, and Baron Rothschild are among the passengers by the Persia, which arrived at this port yesterday.—N. Y. Herald, 13 Dec.

Another Homicide.

It has been now over three months since we have had to record the killing of any one in this city, though a street encounter occurred here on Christmas day which came near resulting in the death of W. A. Hickman. We have now to chronicle another deed of violence and blood, which resulted in death. The victim in the present case was a noted desperado, by the name of Rhodes, and the facts of the case, as near as we have been able to ascertain them, are as follows: Rhodes and a man by the name of Luce met in one of the saloons in this city, early last Thursday evening, when some altercation took place between them, but no collision occurred. An hour or two later Rhodes went to a house on Main street, where W. A. Hickman was confined with a wound received some weeks ago. Rhodes, it was believed, belonged to a band of persons in this city and vicinity, who were at deadly enmity with Hickman and party which he is supposed to head. He was accordingly refused admittance into the room where Hickman was confined; Luce, who was present with others, believing that his visit was not of a friendly nature. On being refused admittance into the room where Hickman was, Rhodes drew a pair of pistols and declared that he would enter or die; at this moment a gentleman by the name of Bates, who happened to be present, ran up and grasped the pistols in Rhodes' hands, and at the same moment both hammers descended on his hands, thus preventing the discharge of the pistols. While this was occurring Luce had also advanced, and with a bowie knife inflicted several wounds upon the breast, shoulder and neck of Rhodes, from which he soon fell and immediately after died. These, we understand, are the main facts adduced on the trial of Luce, which took place on the day following, and upon them he was discharged from custody. The body of Rhodes was taken, either on the night on which he was killed, or early the next morning, to the head quarters of the police in this city, and we have been told by those who saw the wounds on his body, while he was lying there, that they were the most ghastly and horrible that can be conceived of. An indictment was pending against Rhodes before the District Court here, for the murder of a man by the name of McNeil last summer in this city, but we know nothing in regard to the evidence fixing that crime upon him, but there is no doubt of his being a great desperado, and capable of the commission of almost any crime, whether he has done so or not. We have heard not a word of sympathy from any quarter for his fate. The way of the transgressor is truly hard.

Mr. Douglas and Mr. Greeley.

Mr. Douglas was frequently charged, during the last session of Congress, by his political enemies, with holding private and confidential interviews with members of the Black Republican party, on the subject of the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution; and he was openly charged with coalescing with prominent members of that party on this and other questions. Among other charges was that he was on terms of intimate personal and political fellowship with Horace Greeley, and that the latter gentleman several times visited Mr. Douglas at his residence at Washington, for the purpose of holding political interviews with him. These charges against Mr. Douglas, were disproved to the satisfaction of every unprejudiced mind at the time they were first made in Congress. But they have lately been revived in a debate in the House of Representatives, between two members of opposite politics from the State of Illinois; and to set the matter finally at rest, Mr. Greeley, in an editorial over his own signature, in the N. Y. Tribune of Dec. 9th, thus refutes the charge of Mr. Douglas' ever having conferred with him privately on any question of party politics:

"Senator Douglas and I have been acquaintances for ten years or more, during which time each has given and taken hard blows, but I trust no foul ones. I am willing to call the account balanced, if he is. Once only in our lives did we agree on a political question—that of resisting the attempt to force an abhorred constitution on the people of Kansas. During the struggle on that point, I was called to Washington, and went to his house, where we had two conversations on pending political topics. There was at least one witness in each instance, and that witness is now a Republican member of the House. Never before nor since have Mr. D. and I conversed on politics save as opponents, and on that occasion I am glad to have a witness to confirm my own clear recollection that Mr. Douglas' reelection to the Senate, or his future election to any post whatever, was not even mentioned. And never did any letter, message, or word, pass between us implying a desire on his part that I should, or a promise on mine that I would, support him, at any time, for any office whatever. And whoever has at any time reported to you anything inconsistent with this must have drawn on his imagination for his facts, or be laboring under the grossest misapprehension.

SYNOPSIS OF THE President's Message.

The President's message has been delivered to Congress.

The President, after expressing gratitude to the Almighty for blessings received throughout the year, refers to the recent bloody occurrence at Harper's Ferry. These events, bad and cruel in themselves, derived their chief importance from the apprehensions that they are but symptoms of an incurable disease in the public mind which may break out in still more dangerous outrages and terminate at last in open war by the North, and to abolish slavery. While he himself entertains no such apprehensions, they ought to afford a solemn warning to us all to be ready for the approach of danger.

He says: Let me implore my countrymen North and South to cultivate their ancient feelings of mutual forbearance and good will towards each other, and strive to allay the demon spirit of sectional hatred and strife, now alive in the land.

This advice proceeds from the heart of an old public functionary, whose service commenced in the last generation of wiser and conservative statesmen of that day; but he indulges in no gloomy forebodings. He thinks the affair of Harper's Ferry will be the means of allaying the existing excitement, and preventing further outbreaks. He cordially congratulates Congress on the final settlement by the Supreme Court of the question of slavery in territories. The right has been established for every citizen to take his property of any kind, including slaves, into the territories, which belong equally to the whole confederacy, and to have it protected there under the Federal Constitution. Neither Congress nor the territorial legislature, nor any human power has any power to annul or impair this vested right. Thus has the state of a territory during the intermediate period from its first settlement until it becomes a State, been irrevocably fixed by the final decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

He then describes the mode of admission of a territory as a State into the Union. It may be admitted with or without slavery as their constitution may prescribe. This principle has been recognized in the same form by the almost unanimous vote of both houses of the last Congress.

THE SLAVE TRADE.

All lawful means at his command have been employed and will continue to be employed against the slave trade. Our history proves that the fathers of the Republic, in advance of all other nations, condemned the slave trade.

THE CHINESE TREATY.

Ratifications of the Chinese treaty have been exchanged. Two supplemental conventions are, however, pending, relating to the rights of Americans in China and transit duties.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Our difficulties with Paraguay are satisfactorily adjusted. Our relations with France, Russia and all the continental governments of Europe—Spain perhaps excepted—continue to be most friendly.

The President recommends that an appropriation be made to meet the demands of the Amistad claimants.

His opinion in favor of the acquisition of Cuba by fair means remains unchanged; therefore, he agitates the serious attention of Congress to this important subject.

GREAT BRAIN.

He had good reason to believe, until recently, that he would have been able to announce our difficulties with Great Britain as finally adjusted in a manner honorably satisfactory to both parties. From causes, however, which Great Britain had not anticipated, she had not yet completed the arrangements with Honduras and Nicaragua, in pursuance of the understanding of the two Governments. It is, nevertheless, confidently expected this will shortly be accomplished.

In relation to San Juan, he entertained no doubt of the validity of our title. He was happy to state that what was left to Gen. Scott's discretion could not have been placed in better hands. Gen. Scott has successfully accomplished his mission, and there was no longer any reason to apprehend collision of the respective forces during the pending of the negotiations.

He speaks with regret of the unimproved condition of affairs in Mexico. He speaks of the subject at length. Outrages of the worst description, he says, are committed on persons and property, and there is scarcely any form of injury which has not been suffered by one citizen there during a few years past. We are nominally at peace with Mexico, but as far as the interests of our commerce, or our citizens there in any private capacity, are concerned, we might as well be at war.

Mr. McLane, in August last, wrote: "I hope the President will feel authorized to ask Congress for power to order the military forces at the call of the constitutional authority in order to protect our citizens and treaty rights. Unless such power is conferred on him, the evils must increase, &c."

The President adds: I have been reluctantly led to the same opinion, and I feel bound to announce this conclusion to Congress. This is a question which relates to the future as well as to the past and present. The aid which he requires, and which interests all the commercial countries, is that which should belong only to this government, not only by virtue of our neighborhood to Mexico, but by virtue also of our established policy, which is inconsistent with the intervention of any European power in the domestic concerns of the Republic, and for the reasons stated.

The President recommends the express passage of a law authorizing him to employ such a military force to order the military forces at the call of the constitutional authority in order to protect our citizens and treaty rights. Should volunteers be selected, such a force could easily be raised in this country among those who sympathize with the sufferings of our fellow-citizens in Mexico and with the unhappy condition of that country.

Such an accession to the forces of the constitutional government would enable it sooner to reach the capital.

He recommends the establishment of military posts across the Mexican line in Sonora and Chihuahua for the protection of the lives and property of Americans against Indian depredations.

CENTRAL AMERICA.

He thinks the provision of our recent treaty with Nicaragua cannot fail to be satisfactory. He recommends a law authorizing the employment of a naval force for the purpose of protecting American commerce passing by the Panama, Nicaragua and Antioquia routes, and again recommends that authority be given to employ the naval force to protect American commerce from seizure and confiscation by Mexico and the Spanish-American States.

He refers to the failure of the Post Office appropriation, and recommends the passage of a bill at the earliest possible day to pay the amount due the contractors, with interest. Also, to make the necessary appropriation for the Post Office Department for the current year.

He recommends a railway to the Pacific for the seasons which he has heretofore given.

He says that it appears from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury that it is extremely doubtful whether we shall be able to pass through the present and next fiscal year without additional revenue. Should a deficiency occur he recommends that the necessary revenue be raised by an increase of the present duties on imports.

In conclusion, he recommends to the just liberality of Congress the local interests of the District of Columbia.

Extract from the Report of the Secretary of War.

"Affairs in the Territory of Utah remain very much as at the date of my last annual report. The army is inactive, and stands in the attitude of a menacing force towards a conquered and sullen people. I am satisfied that the preservation of rights and justice, through means of any jurisdiction known or recognized by the people of the United States, is impossible in that Territory. It is governed practically, by a system which is in total disregard of the laws or constitution of the land. The laws of the Mormon church and the will of the hierarchy are alone potential there. Beyond a mere outward show of acquiescence in federal authority, they are as irresponsible to it as any foreign nation.

"There is, in the present attitude of affairs, scarcely any necessity for the presence of troops in Utah, and they will be otherwise disposed of in the coming season. There are no complaints of Indian hostilities towards the Mormon people. All other territories and people upon our vast frontiers suffer from Indian depredations, but the Mormon people enjoy an immunity from all their outrages. For the protection of these people against Indians there is no necessity for the presence of a single soldier. Murders and robberies of the most atrocious character have been perpetrated in the Territory upon emigrants from the States journeying towards the Pacific, and in some of the most shocking instances by white men disguised as Indians. The general impression, so far as I have been able to ascertain it, amongst those having opportunity to know, is that these murders are the work of the Mormon people themselves, sanctioned, if not directed, by the authority of the Mormon church.

I cannot commend in terms too high the wise prudence and officerlike conduct of the General commanding the army in Utah. The discipline of his command is admirable, and its efficiency is unsurpassed. Much has been done through the army under command of General Johnston, towards improving the roads in Utah, and to give to the public a fuller knowledge of the condition and resources of the Territory. Captain J. H. Simpson, of the topographical engineers, has, during the past season, explored and opened two new routes from Camp Floyd to California, either of which is about 250 miles shorter than the old emigrant route by the way of the Humboldt river and far better for grass, wood and water.

Over both these routes he conducted a party of sixty-five men and a train of fourteen wagons, and since his return to Camp Floyd, many emigrants with large herds of cattle have passed over the route by which he returned, which is the better of the two. Itineraries for both have been furnished to the public through the press in California and Utah. The saving in time of travel by these roads to emigrants for California is about fifteen days and for the mails about four. The saving in stock and draught cattle on these routes over those formerly traveled, owing to pure water and abundant grass, is estimated at twenty-five per cent. Captain Simpson has also, under the instructions of General Johnston, found a new wagon road pass from the valley of the Great Salt Lake, by the way of the Timpanogos river valley and Des Cheneys fork of the Uinta river, into the valley of Green river, which will shorten the route pursued by Colonel Loring from Camp Floyd to Santa Fe probably as much as eighty miles; and should a practicable pass be found through the Rocky Mountains, by the way of White river, through the middle part between the head waters of the Arkansas and the cache la Poudre, a tributary of the Platte, a wagon road will be obtained through the Pike's Peak gold region, which will be considerably shorter to the States than any we now have.

Dead Letter Vendue at Washington.

A stranger in the city would have been puzzled to account for the furious eagerness displayed last night by the crowd struggling to get into McGuire's auction room. The fair sex was just as crazy as the men, and not a few ladies braved the mud and rain, and jostled at the door for admission in right good earnest.

The attraction was the great

"DEAD LETTER OFFICE SALE,"

advertised for some weeks to take place on this night.

It was announced that the catalogue consisted of articles accumulated in the Dead Letter Office since 1847, (the Department having used every effort to find the proper owners and being unable to do so,) and they would now be sold for the postage; the proceeds, if any, after paying charges, to be deposited in the U. S. Treasury, subject to order, should the proper owners hereafter be found. The articles came from the Post Office, in sealed packages, and no opportunity having been obtained of getting a peep of examination, the bidding was somewhat in the dark, but generally spirited. The buyers naturally supposed that the articles thus sent by mail as pledges of affection must be about the correct thing in point of value.

The auctioneer said he would warrant nothing, as they wanted to close the thing up finally, but if he knew anything to be worthless, he would intimate the fact when it was put up.

A very large proportion—perhaps three-quarters—of the articles were pieces of jewelry. Of these again a large proportion were finger-rings, there being no less than 504, many of them heavy plain gold wedding rings. Then there were earrings in any quantity, gold pencils, bracelets, gold and silver watches, chains, lockets, fruit-knives, breast-pins, studs, fob-chains, medals, &c., &c.

One of the lockets put up for sale, on being opened, was found to contain a miniature, and was immediately withdrawn, as the Department reserves all portraits, not being allowed by the law to sell them.

There was quite a sprinkling of books: The Way to Heaven; Life and Speeches of Henry Clay, 2 vols.; Keeping the Heart; Fatahah; One Hundred Catechisms; Fort's Medical Practice; Stockton's Sermons; Missouri Harmony; African Preacher; Paradise Lost; Allyn's Ritual; Laws of Georgia; three dozen catechisms; Fred. Douglass; Sumner Family; Life of Fremont; Danger of the Dark; Green Book; Hymn Book; Flowers of Piety; Catholic Missal; Livingston's Travels; five German Books; Cotton is King; Bay State Glee Club, &c., &c.

Among the odd things in the miscellany were an extraordinary pair of embroidered suspenders (German styles), which sold for $1; 1 regalia, 5th degree I. O. O. F., brought $1 75; patent inhalant tube, to cure consumption, 37 cents; box dissecting instruments, scarificator, half a dozen chemises, gaffs for game fowl, one corn-field hoe, directed to "Queen Victoria" (the postage upon which amounted to $16); German pipes, gold foil inkstands, kid gloves, spectacles, dagger-repote plates, violin strings, lot of mourning goods, two shawls and sacks, comfort, linen, braids (for colored persons), black summer coat, bed quilt, ear trumpet, three pairs of boots, brogans, lot of hardware, sign on cotton cloth—"Ready-Made Clothing," lot of awls, five dozen watch crystals, and so on to the number of six or seven hundred articles.

Mr. John A. Washington has sent to Mr. George W. Riggs, the treasurer of the Ladies' Mount Vernon Association, an order for $1,228 25, as his contribution to the Mt. Vernon fund, being the proceeds of the Mt. Vernon steamboat trips for the past year, which though payable to Mr. Washington, he has generously caused to be made over to the Association.

A new half dollar has been got up at the United States mint in Philadelphia, to be submitted to the government for its approval. The new coin, although of the same diameter as that now in circulation, is much thicker at the rim in consequence of the deeper sinking of the die, and hence much more durable. On one side is a medallion portrait of Washington with the head wreathed with laurel; the word liberty upon a scroll over the bust; at the bottom the date, 1859; and around the whole the words United States of America, in plain, well adapted raised letters. On the reverse side, a wreath of grain envelope the words half dollar, in the same beautiful letters.

Gibraltar and Malta.

The English strongholds in the Mediterranean are Malta and Gibraltar. Gibraltar was captured by the British from Spain in 1704, and though many efforts have been made since to retake, Great Britain has held possession of it ever since. In 1782, a combined attack by the French and Spanish was made upon it with an army of 40,000 men and one thousand pieces of artillery; forty-seven sailing ships of the line, all three-deckers; ten floating batteries, carrying two hundred and twelve guns; frigates, xebecs, bomb-ketches, cutters, and gun and mortar boats. General Elliott beat the land forces in a sortie, and the naval forces were dispersed, and floating batteries destroyed. Gibraltar has long been considered impregnable. Regular sieges cannot be opened against it, for the simple reason that there are no materials for earth-works within battering range; and even if they were once erected, there is nothing to batter but solid rock, a breach in which would only render the storming more impracticable than ever. Moreover, owing to the immense elevation of the place, it is impossible to prevent assailants from any quarter from being completely overlooked and exposed to the vertical fire of the garrison, without a possibility of returning to it. Malta is also considered impregnable against any attack by sea by any armament hitherto in use. It was captured, as alleged, through the treachery of one of the knights of St. John, by Napoleon, when on his way to Egypt in June, 1798, but continued in the possession of the French only a short time, having been blockaded by a British squadron, and taken by Gen. Pigot in 1800.

Malta has ever since been in the hands of Britain, and was guaranteed her by the treaty of Paris. The Ionian Islands, situated along the eastern coasts of the Adriatic, were captured in 1809 from France by a British fleet. In 1815 the islands were placed by the Congress of Vienna under a British protectorate, in which condition they have ever since remained. On the island of Corfu there is a fortress of very great strength, supposed to be next to impregnable. France will have to dislodge England from these possessions before the former can make the Mediterranean a French lake, the supposed object of Louis Napoleon's ambition, and the purpose probably of the great naval preparations which are being made in France.

A BRIDE BURNED TO DEATH.—A few weeks ago a wedding took place in the northern part of the city which elicited much attention. The parties were Lieut. Wietzell, a native of this city, and a graduate of West Point, and Miss Moor, a daughter of Gen. Moor, Lieut. Wietzell has a large circle of warm and devoted friends in this city, who hastened to congratulate him on his union with one so lovely in person and temper. Soon after the marriage, the young Lieutenant took his wife to West Point, where he was stationed. Last evening the relatives and friends were started to learn by telegraph, that the young and joyous bride had met with a sudden and terrible death. While passing a grade clothes took fire, and before she could be extinguished, she was so injured that she lived but a short time at the terrible calamity, and she has created a feeling of deep regret among the friends of the late couple.—Cincinnati Times.

Must we have an International Neutrality Law?

It is a curious fact, that in all wise provisions of the constitution the United States there is no provision for the punishment of a State for the purpose of invading another, nor has Congress ever applied the omission. Neutrality laws have been enacted against nations on foot armed expeditions against foreign countries with which our government is at peace, but none prevent the citizens of one State from invading another, and organizing an armed force for that purpose.

It seems as if the idea was so horrible to the founders of the republic that they shrank from naming or suggesting such a crime. They are for granted that it never could occur—that no paricides could ever found who would gain any considerable support for such an impious enterprise. They concluded, therefore, that it was time enough to make provision against the enormity when the occasion arose, and that as Congress would have the power in its own hands to apply the remedy "sufficient unto the day is the law thereof."

Unfortunately, the time has come for the action of Congress. Paricides have appeared, and some of them have paid the forfeit of the crimes; some have yet to liquidate the debt due to justice, and some have escaped her long arm and fled to foreign lands. But the evil does not stop here. The Southern States are dangerously alarmed and excited at the facility with which they may be invaded by Northern hordes of desperadoes, and servile insurgents organized and carried into effect. As the law now stands there is nothing to prevent a successor to Mr. Brown setting on foot in any Northern State another armed expedition against Virginia or any of her sister States on Mason and Dixon's line.

Now, as prevention is always better than cure, and as the cure sometimes be too late, there is an absolute necessity for a law of Congress to prevent such conspiracies, those in which John Brown embodied. State laws cannot be dependent on; for the local authorities might be so tainted by treason themselves, so strongly sympathize with the traitors, that they could not carry out the laws, if indeed it were possible to have the necessary acts passed in every State. Such a general law, therefore, is needed as would reach all men in every State—even United States Senators and Governors of States; and that law should have its sanction nothing less than the death penalty, and not even the President should have the power to pardon the criminal or commute his sentence.

There now seems no doubt of the necessity of such a law. But the question is, will a Congress in which the black republican element is so large—an element which sympathizes with John Brown and endorses Helper's treasonable book—be likely to adopt this strong measure, so patriotically called for by the times? Out of 231 votes for Speaker in the House of Representatives on Friday Mr. Sherman, whose name has been signed to the circular endorsing "Impending Crisis," received 115 votes, or within six of what were necessary to elect him. In fact, it is well known that he really requires but two, and if these two could be brought over the rest would follow. It seems, therefore, a foolish hope, to ask such a House of Representatives to pass this law. But ought, nevertheless, to be urged, as the onus thrown upon it of refusing to provide for the safety of the Union, and the better security of the Southern States against raids of men like John Brown. In this way either a republican party would be compelled to show its hand more distinctly, and fully develop its treasonable designs, or consent to a law which would not injuriously affect any good man, any man loyal to the constitution. Such a bill would have the effect of drawing the line of demarcation between traitors and loyalists, and the country will have no difficulty in which side to place those who dare to oppose a measure which appears so necessary for the peace and safety of the Union.—N. Y. Herald.

A New Version of I Wish Was an Editor.

BY AN EDITOR.

I wish you was an editor;
I do, I do declare You'd find no other class have such Good cause to curse and swear;
What if they do the biggest get
Of everything that grows?
They pay ten times its real worth
In lines of well turned prose.
You'd find, you silly, senseless dunce,
That Tripod which you covet,
Stuck full of the rns—a stool of pins—
And quickly say "remove it!"
You'd be compelled to hear at times
Your leaders—penned with pains—
Berated by some grumbling sub,
Who had more brass than brains,
One man would tell you, "Ned, pitca in,
Give Smith particular b—ll."
While Smith would fail to see the joke,
Perhaps "pitch in" himself.
And then when news was scarce and tame,
No murder, theft, crime, con.,
Your grumbling readers, in a spite,
Would find you comos non.
Compelled to read whole rams of trash,
Ground out from poor "machines,"
You'd soon say "Lord deliver us
From these perplexing scenes."
What if at times you did receive
A mammoth squash or beet—
What if the "fat girl" or "twin mules"
Fling "passes" at your feet?
The donors each and all expect
A bouncing quid pro quo,
Which, if you don't give liberally,
They frown, and curse, and blow,
I tell you what it is, my boy,
If you can plow or hoe;
Or turn a grindstone passing well,
Or reap, or thrash, or mow—
Or if you are good at ditching,
Can scrib, or wash, or steal,
You'd better try them—one and all,
Before you tempt the devil.

There's something in a Kiss.

There's something in a kiss.
Though I cannot reveal it,
That never comes amiss,
Not even when we steal it.

We cannot taste a kiss,
And sure we cannot view it.
But is there not a bliss
Communicated through it?

I'm well convinced there is A certain something in it—
For though a simple kiss,
We wisely strive to win it.

There's something in a kiss,
If nothing else would prove it,
It might be proved by this—
All honest men love it.

How They Got the Frauds and how They Lost Them.

A TALE OF REAL LIFE WITH A TAIL TO IT.

We of the north, seldom get up anything sufficiently ridiculous to raise a laugh. This is owing more to the want of originality than to any repugnance to cackling. Since election we have been in a state bordering on grave—as contrasted with gay—until a little more than a week ago, when circumstances, that we are about to relate, furnished provocation enough to excite the risibilities of every Democrat and many Republicans for miles around.

Two weeks ago we chronicled the advent of a man from Omaha, in search of frauds. Stopping at the Bates House while here, he done some tall talking and some tall traveling through the town, and appeared wiser than an owl. He is the hero that adorns our tale, and we shall call him, for shortness, Jim.

Jim had a wretched looking quadruped of the species equine, that he inserted between the shafts of a dilapidated wagon, and by their aid combined, managed to make his progress of a rotary nature. Getting ready to leave here, he settled his bill, muffled himself up comfortably, and taking in a passenger whom we will call Bill, started for Niobrara. Jim's business having leaked out, word was sent to the place of fraud, to look out for the arrival of distinguished personages on important business. Jim and Bill were there three days, or thereabouts, vibrating in the rickety vehicle, before Niobrara hove in sight. Judge T——, Col. G—— and others had time to manufacture a pollbook of 128 names, among which were those of Howell Cobb, John Brown, Lucy Stone, Terrence O'Toole, Hauns Peter, Michael Schneider, and numerous others of a similar character, with a few who lived right in town; and placed the same in the keeping of the county clerk, with instructions to furnish the fraud hunters with a copy. Our don having used all precaution imaginable to avoid detection, and fortifying their determination with sundry draughts from a fluid, known as a certain cure for snake bites, made a straight wake for the county clerk's office. The look they gave that official as they demanded a copy of the poll book, is represented as terrific. He was not so badly scared but that he made one out, and after making Jim come down with the "spoiler" for the same, handed a copy of the fraudulent poll-

book to them. Success having attended them thus far, they concluded to take some "rye." By this time the wheels had disappeared from their wagon and they were in a sad plight. Believing that they had been found out and the object of their visit discovered, they grew somewhat weak about the knee. Jim proposed another drink, which proposition was acquiesced in by Bill. Looking at the matter in a very serious light, and divining what the d—d Democrats might do, they concluded that as they had no conveyance by which they could leave town together, that one of them should take the horse and the frauds and escape from the place under cover of night. This plan having been adopted, it fell to Bill to make the necessary preparations for his scarceness in Niobrara, between that time and daylight of the next morning; Jim was to remain and, if necessary, die for the success of the undertaking.

When old Sol sank in the West, sundry Democrats and not a few Republicans, were seen dodging around the corners and keeping a sharp lookout for the fraud-hunters. Jim and Bill were not to be outdone, so stepping into a saloon, apparently to take a drink, but ostensibly to delude the vigilance of those who were watching them. Bill started out the back way and streaked for the barn that contained the horse, like a shot. Then was Bill determined that the world should know, by what fool means his darling delegate, Daily, was not elected to Congress. Panting and palpitating he reached the stable—but lo! he found the door locked. This was unexpected. The simple turning of a key had turned the groundwork of all their plans, topsy turvy, and our adventurers were again foiled. Bill had turned back to where he left Jim, and found him slightly oblivious and nearly annihilated with fear. They internally raved and swore, while those "post-ed" were supporting posts and buildings about town, and holding on to their sides to keep them from splitting. It was now concluded to confront the two men of law (Jim and Bill are both lawyers) and demanded a look at the poll book, as they wanted to see if their names were on it. This was a poser but Jim and Bill were in a minority and counting noses, "saw plainly"—to quote their words—"that numbers" were against them. Jim said if they would stand back and make no attempt to snatch it, he would read the list. This was assented to by all. The reading over, all took a drink. Bill having a new idea sprung on his brain, proposed to Jim that he would take the frauds and leave town on foot, and guaranteed some extraordinary pedestrianism for the first four miles. Terms being agreed upon and not knowing as they would ever see each other again on this abulatory sphere, embraced, took a drink and parted, each the bearer of a sad farewell to the friends of the other, should mishap befall them in their hazzardous adventure among the Democracy of Northern Nebraska.

An hour passed on and Bill had reached a place of safety, while Jim was troubled with visions of hoofs, forked tails, and murderous Democrats. During this time Judge T—— and the others concluding they had fun enough for one night, determined to give them a supper of the best the place could afford, in order to show them that L' Eau qui Court could cast 128 votes for the Democratic ticket, could humor a joke, and could extend their hospitality to not over sharp Republicans. Accordingly when the table was spread, a delegation started for the hotel, but found that one of the birds had flown. Seeing the effect that had been produced on Jim and Bill, they concluded to play the prank out. Going to Jim's bed-room door, they commenced a furious knocking and demanded instant admission in very boisterous tones. He scarcely knew what to do; but after giving matters and things due consideration, stoutly insisted on knowing their business. One more forward than the rest, said their object was to obtain possession of the copy of the poll book, and that they were bound to have it at any cost.—He then told them it was not in his possession, that Bill had it and left town. Nothing but the opening of the door would suffice, and he accordingly sprang the bolt and let them in. They found him standing in the middle of the floor, his nakedness half covered with a woollen raiment, vulgarly denominated a shirt. Without observing any further ceremony, than frequent declarations, that have the secreted papers they must, they instituted a rigorous search into his boots, stockings and cap, to find the missing papers, but their search was fruitless. They next seized Jim and promanaded him through the passage, down stairs, and up to the bar, in a half nude state; and while all took a drink, several took occasion to dilate on the magnificent proportions of his two bare legs. Ascertaining where Bill had housed himself, they determined to see the joke "through," and accordingly started to pay their regards to that individual, who eluded their hospitality by nocturnal adroitness. Arriving at the place, they surrounded the house to prevent the escape of the papers, and having all things fixed, made a noise. This aroused the host and his guest, and upon the former going to the door and taking a look at the elements, suddenly shrank back and informed Bill that the house was surrounded. It is said that Bill turned all colors but black, during the next thirty seconds succeeding the announcement; he gave himself up for lost and became resigned to his fate. The crowd entered and demanded "them papers." Bill gave the host an exploring look as much as to say "he who steals my purse, steals trash, but he who filches from me those papers, takes that which makes me poor indeed;" but the host only gave a shrug of his shoulders and intimated very distinctly that he had better "fork" them over immediately. Being unable to get out of his tracks, he instinctively pointed at them and audibly ejaculated "papers!" The papers being secured, one of the crowd waggishly, roared that Jim and Bill be thrown into the river. Enough voted for it to give it the resemblance of earnestness, but the motion did not prevail. They then went back to town whence they repaired to the quarters of Col. G—— where the guests were long expected, and sitting down to a table groaning with roast beef and puddings, which were washed down their gutters alternately with Rio Java and Rye, they became very enthusiastic. We regret we have not room for the speeches and toasts of Jim, delivered at the feast. We may find room for them in some subsequent Herald, and if we do we promise our readers some rich things.

There is but one instance on record that we know of, that bears any comparison to the adventure of our daring fraud-hunters, and that has been beautifully and graphically described by a celebrated American poet in the following affecting lines:

"Peter Gray went to the north
For furs and other skins,
And lost the top of his head
By the bloody In-jins."

We think the adventure of Peter Gray was not a circumstance to that of our heroes, and we accordingly commemorate the deed by improving on Peter Gray.

Jim and Bill went to the north
For "frauds" and other things.
They got nearly scared to death,
And nary "fraud" did bri-ling.

The Perplexities of Courting a City Girl.

The particulars of a very humorous series of misfortunes, which happened to a young and ardent lover, of Sandlake, who came to this city to call upon and "talk sweet" to his innamorata, came to our notice yesterday. The young man, as above intimated, is a resident of Sandlake, Rens. county, (we have his name, but won't mention it,) and one day last week he put on his best "bib and tucker" and started for this city. Leaving home early in the morning, he arrived in this city about 2 p. m.; so, after having his hair dressed so that he might look "stunner," he drove to the abode of the object of his attention.

Arrived there, he entered, leaving his horse and buggy at the door; the animal was of that class that would stand without hitching. As is often the case, the moments and hours flew quickly by—they always do when we are with those we love, and it was quite half-past 7 when the blissful interview was brought to a close. But upon emerging into the street the horse and buggy were not to be found. Up and down the street he looked, but old Dobbin wasn't "thar." He grew alarmed, and finally ran around the block; but no signs of his vehicle and horse could be gained. The matter grew to be one of serious import. So he made the circuit of several blocks, and still no tidings of his establishment could be gained. His first apprehensions were more than realized. His horse and wagon had certainly been stolen! And he was some fourteen miles from home. In this dilemma he bethought himself of his good friend, Chinimshaw, of the Merchants Dispatch; and so procuring his aid they started in pursuit of the missing property. The aid of the Second District Police was invoked, and Officer Kipp, of Troy, was informed by telegraph of the robbery, as well as being furnished with a description of the horse and buggy. An hour's search by our police developed the fact that the animal being found "at large," by some of the Third District Police, had been taken to a stable near the Station House. This good luck on the part of our young friend induced him to give those who had aided him in the search an invitation to drink, and after imbibing he started for home.—But it had now become so late that he found it necessary to go home by way of Troy. It is a tedious, round-about way of getting home, but then he had his horse and buggy, and the assurances of the undying affection of the object of his fondest desires. Feeling thus, what should prevent his giving vocal expression to it in the language of the poet,

"Am I not fondly thine own?"

Who but officer Kipp would have posted himself at the eastern end of Troy bridge, and noticing that the horse and wagon answered the description of that stolen in Albany, insisted that the driver should accompany him to jail! In vain did our young friend plead and explain, but all to no purpose. He had to pass the remainder of the night in jail as the suspected thief of his own property; and in the morning even it required corroborative testimony to insure his discharge. When next our amorous friend does a wooing go, he should fetch a halter with him—Albany Times.

A funny correspondent of the Portland Transcript says: "I have recently gin up all idea of the women folks, and cum back to perlitital life. I'm more to hum in this line than in huntin' of the fair sex. Aingills in petuits and 'kiss me quicks' is pretty enough to look at, I gin in; but darn 'em, they is as slippery as eels; and when you fish for 'em, and git a bite, you somehow or other find yer at the wrong end of the line—they's cothched you! And when you've stuffed 'em with peanuts, candy and doggeritytypes, they'll throw you away as they would a cole tater. Leastwise, that's ben my experience. But I've dun with 'em now. The Queen of Sheber, the Sleepin' Bewty, Kleopatry's heedle, Pompy's pillow and Lot's wife, with a steam engine to help 'em, couldn't tempt me! The very sight of a bunnet riles me all over."

Be a Woman.

Oh! I've heard a gentle mother,
As the twilight hours began,
Pleading with a son on duty,
Urging him to be a man.
But, unto her blue-eyed daughter,
Tho' with love's words quite as ready,
Points she out the other's duty,
"Strive, my dear, to be a lady."

What's a lady? It is something
Made of hoops, and silks, and airs,
Used to decorate the parlor,
Like the fancy rugs and chairs?
It is one that wastes on novels,
Every feeling that is human?
If 'tis this to be a lady,
'Tis not this to be a woman.

Mother, then, unto your daughter,
Speak of something higher far,
Than to be mere fashion's lady—
"Woman is the brighter star.
If ye, in your stronger affection,
Urged your son to be a true man,
Urge your daughter no less strongly
To arise and be a woman."

Yes a woman—brightest model
Of that light and perfect beauty,
Where the mind, and soul, and body,
Blend to work out life's great duty—
Be a woman—naught is higher
On the gilded list of fame;
On the catalogue of Virtue,
There's no brigh'er, holier name.

THE DOUBLE ESCAPE.

BY CHARLES T. ISLEY.

"I tell the tale as it was told me."

PART FIRST.

There never was a class of men more active and enterprising—more resolute and daring—than that class to which the Yankee Tar belongs. If money is to be made, you will find his tawny jib-boom poking saucily about the poles—or see his little nutshell of a craft dashing gallantly away upon unknown seas with all the confidence of an "Old Trader." In the same pursuit, too, you will find him fearlessly running the gauntlet of an enemy's fleet; and, if captured, somehow or other most always contriving, like an eel, to slip through their fingers. We have a story to relate on this point which the reader may rely on as truth. The facts as we have recorded them, were derived from one of the persons—the only survivor concerned in the affair. We give name and dates, and we doubt not there are many in Salem and Providence who will remember the incidents of our history.

Immediately after the Declaration of War in 1812, our whole coast was swarming with British cruisers, and every craft that ventured to show herself outside was pounced upon, hawk-like, by our watchful enemy; so that a coastwise trip was, in fact, a mere running of the gauntlet, in which he was a lucky fellow who escaped capture. Notwithstanding the chances were so much against them, many were perfectly willing to run the hazard in consideration of the immense profits that accrued from a successful voyage. There was something, too, in the nature of the enterprise that suited well the daring character of those engaged in it. They "calculated" on being taken, but they "rather guessed as how" they could manage to give John Bull the slip—for though Johnny is a pretty shrewd chap in the main, yet he is not a circumstance to Brother Jonathan, who can outwit him with his eyes shut.

In the fall of the year, some three or four months after the declaration of war, a fleet of eight or ten small craft was fitted out of Salem, by Willard Pelee and others, intended for the Philadelphia flour trade. Among them was the schooner Fox, a little fore-and-aft of about fifty tons. Samuel Hodgdon, master, George Heussler, mate, an old experienced pilot by the name of Eldridge, and the boy Bill, from whom, by the way, we derive these particulars, formed her complement of men. Our lit-

hold, snugly stowed against the bulk-heads, for those were not strictly temperance times, was a barrel of American gin. Thus appointed, the Fox topped her boom and was off, with a fair wind and a good promise of success, for a late arrival stated that no cruisers were to be seen in the bay.

For three days the little craft went jauntily on her course unmolested and at the close of the third day, a clear sea still before them, they "took a pull at the peak" all round for the successful prosecution of their voyage thus far. On the fourth morning they found themselves off Great Egg Harbor, and much to their chagrin in the close neighborhood of a strange sloop-of-war. Running away was out of the question, and in answer to one or two rather pressing invitations, by a messenger not over particular in regard to forms and ceremonies, the Fox hauled her wind, and stood for her unwelcome neighbor.

"Nabbed, by Jupiter!" said the old pilot, squirting a small cataract of tobacco juice to leeward, as he saw a boat put off from the sloop-of-war filled with men.

In a few moments Capt. Hodgdon had the pleasure of being told that he was a prize to his British Majesty's sloop-of-war Prometheus, of seventeen guns, and that the company of himself and mate was particularly requested on board. With as good a grace as could be mustered the requisition was complied with, and the Captain and mate repaired on board. They mounted the sides and stepped on deck with certainly any but agreeable feelings. They went aft, and scarcely had they doffed their tarpaulins to his Majesty's representative, than with true Yankee spirit, the skipper began to chaffer with his captor, endeavoring to strike a bargain for the release of his craft. At first the commander would not harken to his proposals, but declared his intentions to burn her forthwith. By dint of perseverance, however, the skipper prevailed upon him to come to terms, and he agreed, for a certain sum in specie, to ransom the schooner.

Not having the specie on board, but being provided with bills of credit it was settled that our skipper should land at Great Egg Harbor, cash his bills, and bring off the rhino. Landing for that purpose, Capt. Hodgdon found that he could not procure the specie until the next day. Most of the day was spent in trying to negotiate his bills, and as it was late in the afternoon when he returned on board the sloop-of-war, the commander agreed to wait until the next morning, threatening, if the money was not forthcoming, to "burn, sink and destroy," as his orders ran.

With the consent of the commander, the captain and mate were permitted to go on board their own vessel for the night, which was in charge of a midly and nine men. During the night the two vessels were to lay off and on the harbor, close in company, although with such a force on board the schooner, of course not the least suspicion was entertained of an attempt to recapture. Not relishing, however, the idea of making so unprofitable a voyage if the ransom money was paid, nor of seeing their little craft burnt nor themselves prisoners if it was not, Heussler, the mate, and the boy Bill laid their heads together to re-take the schooner. Rather a formidable undertaking, it must be confessed, with ten armed men on board and the guns of the sloop-of-war, like sleeping thunder, frowning upon them. Undeterred by the almost hopelessness of their task, Heussler and the boy arranged the plot, giving the captain and the pilot a hint of their intentions, which they readily acquiesced in.

The night set in, and our determined fellows set about the accomplishment of their work. At this time the two vessels having made considerable offing, were lying to—the Sloop-of-war under reefed top sails, and the schooner, immediately under her guns, with her helm lashed a-lee, her fore and main sails trimmed close aft, and her jib hauled to windward. About eight o'clock Heussler and the pilot turned in, while the Capt. and Middy, a very gentlemanly young fellow, by the way, sat chatting together in the cabin over a dim light—the boy Bill in the meantime being on deck with the Sloop-of-war's men who were lounging around the windlass, cracking jokes, telling long yarns, listening apparently with the greatest interest to the stories of Old Salts, occasionally throwing in a word and laughing heartily at their relation of strange adventures.

"I say, you spawn of a Yankee," said one of them as he wound up his yarn, "you have been sitting there chuckling this half hour; bad manners to you! Can't you do something towards helping out the evening's entertainment?"

"What can I do?" was Bill's laughing reply.

"Have you a plug of tobacco about you, youngster? I have been on a short allowance of tarred rope these two months."

"I have no tobacco," said Bill; "If I could get at the skipper's chest, I might smuggle a bite for you. But I tell you what," he added, lowering his voice, "there's a barrel of gin on board, and if you'd like to wet your whistles I guess I can hook a drop. The old man won't mind it, seeing he is going to get clear to-morrow. Will that do?"

Of course this proposition received the eager assent of all hands. A bucket and dipper was soon found, the hatches silently removed, and Bill crept slyly down the hold after the coveted liquor, the men in the meantime raising their voices in conversation in order to drown any noise Bill might make in securing the prize. After a while he appeared with the bucket full of gin, and a hearty swig was taken all round. It may be supposed that such a good opportunity was not permitted to pass unimproved, and the "main brace" was "spliced" pretty often. Old Salts are proverbially thirsty dogs, and it was not long ere soundings were found in the bucket. The sailors grew more voluble, and many a tough story was recounted, each man the hero of his own tale.

After a while, the bucket being dry, more than one hint was given that a fresh nip would not be disagreeable. Bill demurred at first; but by repeated urging at last reluctantly consented to bring on another bucket. It was brought, emptied and replenished again. In fact Bill plied them so briskly with liquor that, though not over strong, before long they were all in a comfortable state of somnolency.

Having assured himself that there was no danger to be apprehended from his late boon companions, Bill crept aft, and giving a preconcerted signal Heussler left his berth and sauntered on deck, with only a part of his dress on, for fear of exciting the suspicions of the Middy, who sat half dozing over some newspapers which the Captain had furnished him. The first object of the mate and the young conspirator was to secure the arms of the sleepers, by which time also the pilot came on deck. With his assistance the men were bound and bundled down the fore-peak. This accomplished, the Captain, who had a hint of the progress of affairs, immediately addressed the astonished Middy—at the same time very coolly taking a brace of pistols from the capacious pockets of his pen-jacket, and cocked them—saying he "hoped he would make himself as comfortable as he could, for he was his prisoner!" at the same time begging to be excused if he left him for the present to his own meditations, as duty called him on deck. We cannot stop to describe the wonder of our Middy at this unexpected speech. Suffice it that, seeing how affairs had turned he submitted as philosophically as he could, while the Captain went on deck, fastening his late prize-master below.

It was now getting towards midnight. So far everything had succeeded well; but the worst was yet to come. How to get away from the sloop-of-war was their next study. The schooner, as we have said, was lying in close proximity to her guns, and if she attempted an escape, one broadside would blow her to atoms. Their first endeavor was to increase the distance between the two vessels. This they did by the pilot's cautious assumption of the helm, and taking advantage of every favorable circumstance, by yawing and filling, so that by degrees the distance was insensibly increased. Edging along in this way until he found he had got in the neighborhood of the shoals of Cape

May—the others in the meantime having secretly got everything ready for a start—they suddenly made sail and ran towards the shoals. They had scarcely filled away when crack!—came a gun from the sloop-of-war.

"Blaze away, my good fellows!" said the skipper, exultingly, "it will require good eye sight to hit the little Fox this distance in the night." And blaze away they did, though every shot flew high over the fugitive craft doing her not the least damage in hull, spar or rigging.

Meanwhile, in an incredibly short space of time, the sloop-of-war had packed on all sail and was blowing directly in the wake of the runaway. The only chance of our Yankee was to creep in among the shoals where her pursuer could not, from her draft, follow her. This she did, having a good start and being a good sailer, until the sloop-of-war thought it prudent to haul off, finding she could neither cripple nor overhaul her. The Fox still continued her course, running for the Rip-Raps inside of which is a passage way, while the Prometheus bore up with the intention of running round the shoals and heading her off. But as the Fox had a straight cut, while her pursuer had a round-a-bout passage, the former got the start of her and succeeded in getting safely into the Delaware. At New Castle was a depot of gunboats, stationed there to guard the mouth of the river. Running into this place, our Yankees delivered up their chop-fallen prisoners, and then proceeded on to Philadelphia, not a little proud of their daring achievement.

PART SECOND.

Having taken in a full cargo of flour at Philadelphia, where they remained about three weeks, our Yankee friends started for Salem. They waited for a very dark night ere they left the Delaware, in the hope of escaping the enemy, who were prowling about the Capes, watching the mouth of the river as the cat eyes a rat hole, ready to pounce upon the first that attempted egress. Taking advantage of an unusually dark evening, and having a very stiff breeze, they started. The schooner was a good sailer, in excellent trim, and they cracked on to her. Towards morning, having had a fine night's run, the skipper turned in, congratulating himself that, at any rate, he had slipped by one dangerous point. Not a little anxiety was felt by all on board to avoid the enemy, and more particularly the sloop-of-war, for they well knew if they should fall again into her clutches, it would go hard with them. They knew no mercy would be shown them.

"The little Fox will baffle them this time," said the old pilot, turning the enormous quid in his mouth, which he had been chewing with an activity that plainly showed the anxiety of his mind. When a sailor has any unusual care on his mind, the way he uses up tobacco is a caution! "Here, you Bill, he continued, keep your weather eye open. Look sharp, youngster! it is getting toward daylight. Gin won't save us this time. What awful swillers those fellows were!" he added in a sort of parenthesis.

Bill needed no promptings. The idea of being carried across the "big pond," and then thrust into a crowded prison was anything but agreeable to him. His eyes, therefore, were in almost every quarter at one and the same moment, and scarcely had the day dawned when he sung out lustily, "Sail ho!" And "sail ho!" it was, true enough, for as the light increased they found themselves close aboard of two large vessels standing under easy sail on their weather beam.

"It is all over with us," said the pilot, despondingly, as he cast his eyes toward their neighbors, "and here comes our death-warrant," he added, as the flash of a gun was seen issuing from the bowsprit of the nearest and largest of the vessels, while its heavy report came booming over the water.

"That means away to!" said the mate—"Skipper ahoy! You're wanted on deck," he shouted down the companion way, arousing the captain from a very agreeable dream of sailing safely into the harbor of Salem.

The schooner, notwithstanding the hint that had been given, still continued on her course as though unmindful of the presence of her warlike neighbors, when another flash was seen, followed by a louder report, and a ball came dancing along, striking water directly under the bowsprit of the schooner, and scattering the spray in all directions.

"Ay, ay! don't be in such a blessed hurry," growled the old pilot, "the world wa'n't made in a day."

"Hard-a-lee!" shouted the captain, who had now come on deck, "it's no use, pilot, the fates are against us. We must run under the big fellow's quarter."

"I say, you Bill, bring us a drop of comfort," exclaimed the old man as he brought the schooner up in the wind; "we shall be put on short allowance soon, and we must make the most of it while we can."

It grieves us to say the old man sought for comfort where too many find misery. However, those were old-fashioned times, when a glass of bitters was rolled as a sweet morsel over the tongue.

"Schooner ahoy!" shouted a gruff voice from the gangway of the larger vessel, which proved to be the frigate Belvidere, "your name and cargo?" "The Fox, of Salem, with flour," was the reply.

"Ay, ay," was the response, followed in a few moments with an order to drop alongside of her consort, which was but a short distance to leeward, and discharge part of her cargo, reserving the balance for the frigate.

The feelings of our Yankee skipper may be better imagined than described when on obeying the order, he found himself fastened to his old captor, the Prometheus. Curses not a few were showered upon him for the Yankee trick he had played them.

"We've got you now, my fine fellows, safe enough," said one of the officers superintending the tackle by which the flour was discharged. "You'll have to take it my boys," said another. "Despite its cunning and doubling we have earthed the Fox this time," added a third. And so the remarks ran on as they proceeded to transfer the flour from the schooner to the sloop-of-war. Before doing this, however, six hammocks with their bedding were slung over the schooner's side as fenders to prevent chafing.

Our Yankees listened to the taunting remarks of their captors in silence, and doggedly assisted in breaking bulk, save now and then the old pilot grumbling out his spleen, in anything but the choicest language, as he cast rather a wolfy glance at the mass of heads that peered down upon them from the railing of their enemy.

About thirty barrels had been transferred, when the frigate, which was now at the leeward, suddenly threw out a signal to the Prometheus to follow her in chase of a strange sail, apparently a large vessel which had just appeared in sight. Not stopping to take in the hammocks, and determined at any rate not to lose their present prize—a second time, they seized the schooner's cable around the foremast, and taking it on board the sloop of war, made it fast. They then ordered our skipper to make sail, threatening if he attempted to escape to sink him on the instant.

The Prometheus soon started in chase with the Fox in tow. The wind blew pretty fresh and the schooner dashed along at a merry rate in the wake of her captor, her speed being such as to cause but little hindrance to the sloop.

It was past noon when the chase commenced; and for two or three hours the Prometheus and her prize slipped along in fine style, when, thinking that now or never was the time to effect an escape, Heussler, after consulting with the captain, crept along on his hands and knees forward with a hatchet, and succeeded in severing nearly all the strands of the cable which served as a tow line—taking the precaution, however, to leave the cut ends as though the cable had parted.

In a short time afterwards the pilot managed, by yawing the schooner, to bring a pretty hard strain upon the cable, and they had the satisfaction of seeing it snap like a thread.

The schooner after this still continued on her course, as though she did not mean to give her captor the slip—but somehow or other her helmsman steered so wildly that the sloop-of-war began to forge ahead of her. Thus the captor and her prize stood on the same tack until the sun began to get low, by which time the former, by her superior sailing, had run herself nearly hull down.

"Nearly time to 'bout ship, skipper!" said the pilot inquiringly. "It will take longer legs than that craft has got to overtake us now, I'm thinking."

"Ready about!" said the captain, and in a moment the little Fox was on another tack, once more running from her enemy.

As the night fell the wind increased, and before midnight a heavy gale was raging. The fugitives held on their way as long as they could, until it was absolutely perilous to run any longer, when they were obliged to lay to. The wind blew furiously, and there was a tad sea running, but the Fox was a noble sea-boat and she rode it out bravely. To prevent her making so much lee-drift, a 'drag' was thrown over, which checked her from falling off considerably. The gale continued through the night, but so anxious were our Yankee crew to keep clear of their late captor, they thought little of the storm.

When the morning broke so that objects could be discerned at a distance, what should greet the sight of the wearied watchers but the self-same cruiser, still hovering like a phantom ship around them. The vessel to which she and the frigate gave chase probably proved to be one of their cruisers, and she had put back, following in the track of the Fox like a hound on the scent. The gale, however, brought her to bay, and when she was discovered she was lying to under the snugest sail, about two miles to leeward. Fortunately for our Yankee, the gale still continued to blow with fury, and the sloop of war made so much lee-way that by noon, to the great joy of those on board the schooner, she had drifted out of sight. The next morning, about noon after, the skipper thought it best to cut stick and make tracks, which he immediately did.

Making the best of his way along, by sundown he found himself off Montauk Point, intending to run into New London. Thinking it best, however, after so many narrow escapes to see if he had a clear way before him, Bill was sent to the mast-head to reconnoitre. Shinning up the back stay, hand over fist, Bill had no sooner arrived at a point where he could have a full view, when he bawled out "Sail ho! Sail ho!"

"Where away?" "In the sound," shouted Bill; "By George, there's a whole fleet of them!"

Sure enough, there they were, a whole squad of the enemy.

"We must run for Newport," said the skipper; "are you acquainted along here Mr. Eldridge?"

"Never was here in my life, skipper, but we will try and feel our way along. We've got a good departure, and when we get hold of Point Judith light we shall manage well enough, if the wind holds, I dare say."

The night shut in dark as pitch—a circumstance which, though at first deemed unfavorable, proved their salvation perhaps. The wind had now become rather light; but in due time Point Judith light was made, which having passed some distance, they dropped their mudhook just off the town of South Kingstown, not a little rejoiced at their safety.

Secure, however, as they deemed themselves, their perils were not quite yet over; for about daylight next morning a boat came alongside, and a young man who was in it hailed the pilot, who happened to be on deck alone.

"How did you get here, or rather, why are you here? This is no place for you, sir."

"How did we get here, youngster?"

"We didn't grow here, that's certain—but what is it to you why we came, or how we got here?" said the old man gruffly.

"Don't get wrathful, old fellow—my only object is to serve you. Do you know you are in a bad neighborhood?"

"In a bad neighborhood, say you, sir?" said the skipper, who had now come on deck, attracted by the strange voice.

"Yes sir," the young man replied.

"An armed schooner, the Liverpool packet, of Halifax, is at anchor just under the light. You must have run by her in the night. Lucky for you, it was so dark. She has been hovering around here this long time, taking everything that comes along. I wonder how you kept out of her clutches."

"This is not safe anchorage, then?"

"If you know when you are well off, skipper, you will not remain here long, but your boom for Providence."

"Why Newport?"

"You are not safe there. A number of vessels have recently been cut out of Newport harbor. You can't be off too soon, skipper, and if you wish for any assistance, I will help you to get underweigh."

The young man's information and offer of aid were gratefully received. All hands—that is, Bill and the mate—were called, the anchor hove short, sails hoisted, and in a short time, with a fresh breeze, and under a full press of sail, the little Fox, carrying a bone in her mouth, was on her way to Providence.

She entered the harbor in grand style, with her colors flying and her six hammocks slung over her side, trophies of her "gallant deeds." Here the vessel and cargo were sold; and a noble voyage she made of it, notwithstanding her loss of the thirty barrels of flour. Out of the fleet that sailed with her, only two others escaped—the rest were taken and destroyed. The crew of the Fox returned by land—Bill as big as Cuffee, with six dollars prize money (his share of the spoils) taken, as he said, "with ten prisoners from His Britannic Majesty's sloop-of-war Prometheus, 17 guns, of Long Island, by the schooner Fox, of Salem, armed with one barrel of gun, and with four men"—for there was no more of the boy to Billy after that adventure.

A HUGE CANNON.—We have from time to time, for a good while past, dropped in at the Fort Pitt Works to see how they were getting on with the preparation for casting the great gun which they have named the "Floyd." Nicholas Wade, Esq., who was in Russia in the employ of that government during a portion of the Crimean war, and a junior member of the firm of Knapp, Reed & Co., made the drawings, patterns, etc., and the moulding, casting and general direction of the work have been under the care of Mr. Jos. Kay, of the 5th ward. The great work is at length consummated, and deserves to be celebrated in a poem like Schiller's Song of the Bell. If this is not the largest cannon in the world, then we are mistaken. Seventy-eight thousand pounds of metal were used in the casting, which is four feet two inches in diameter, and nineteen feet five inches in length. The work was completed yesterday in the space of about four and a half hours. The metal was melted in what are known as reverberatory air furnaces. The mould was a ponderous structure, and was placed vertically in a pit prepared for that purpose. The iron flask weighed thirty-one thousand pounds, and with the earthen mould, fifty-four thousand pounds. Its weight when filled with the iron was one hundred and twenty-eight thousand pounds.

This gun was cast hollow, according to an invention of Captain Rodman, of the U. S. Ordnance Department, and the job was done under his general supervision. The metal is cooled within the hollow of the gun by means of a stream of water, which is passed through the earthen core. The cold water at the rate of about forty gallons per minute is passed in through a pipe at the top and in the centre of the core and is discharged at the bottom. This stream is continued during the time the casting is cooling. The success which has attended this undertaking so far, is a guarantee that the subsequent work upon this ponderous "bore" will be performed. We believe that all the cannons hitherto made at the Fort Pitt Works have proved of very superior quality, capable of enduring a greater number of discharges than those made at any other foundry. These facts ought to direct the attention of Congress to this city as the favored point before all others for a National foundry, which we trust will be established here in due time.—Pitts. Gaz.

The question "Why printers did not succeed as well as brewers?" was answered thus: "Because printers work for the head, and brewers for the stomach; and where twenty men have stomachs, but one has brains."

The Exactions of the Mormon Church.

When Madam Roland was placed on the guillotine for execution during the darkest and fiercest period of the French revolution, she gave utterance to that remarkable expression which has since passed into a political maxim, "O Liberty, Liberty! what wrongs are done in thy name?" This saying of Madam Roland is as applicable to religion as it ever was to liberty. The excesses, tyrannies and wrongs, which, under the specious pretext and guise of liberty, have been heaped upon the world, have been neither greater, nor more oppressive than those with which artful pretenders and hypocrites have during almost every age of the world contrived to load their followers with.

History indeed, furnishes no example of any hero, warrior, usurper or dictator who, under the pretense of giving greater liberty to the masses, has assumed absolute power in himself; but it at the same time affords a parallel instance of some religious impostor or bigot, who, practising on the credulity of such as professed faith in their pretensions, have subjected them to equal, if not greater oppressions.

Human nature is the same in all ages, and in every part of the world, and notwithstanding the experience of the past, the world can be humbugged in our day as easily as in former ages. And it does not even require the invention of what is altogether new to do this; but take some old and exploded system, add a little to it one place, and subtract a little from it in another—call it by some new name—herald it with zeal to the world, and proselytes and followers are sure to be the result. Like the worn out puppets which amused and deceived us when boys, with a new dress and a skillful hand at the wires, they continue to amuse and deceive boys in our days. Of all the tricks and impositions that have been practised on the world, none have been so successful as those of a religious kind, and for the reason that mankind are more easily misled on this subject than on any other.

The rise and progress of the Mormon Church, affords an excellent illustration of the truth of the latter remark. It is a system which combines the grossness and sensuality of Mohammedanism with the rites and orgies of the Hindoo worship, and subjects its followers to the hardships and exactions which belong to both these systems. The story told of its origin, is so flimsy and improbable as to excite in a thinking mind only the idea of ridicule, or at most of contempt. Its founder was a low-bred and ignorant man remarkable only for a certain degree of low cunning and deceit, and he is said by those who knew him, to have been both a libertine and a debauchee.

It might seem remarkable, that such a religion, with such an origin, should find adherents, if we did not consider how often mankind have before been deceived by systems and impostors scarcely less glaring and absurd. It must likewise be borne in mind that certain persons have an immediate and selfish object in keeping up the delusion which has been implanted, and that no means are spared of perpetuating error where it has once taken root. In the Mormon church, the motives for this course are obvious to the most casual beholder; for here a few devour the substance of many, and the toil of the poor adds to the coffers of those that are already rich. No people in the world are, as a body, more industrious than the dwellers in this valley.—With a soil naturally sterile, and with an artificial system of irrigation which has to be kept up in order to supply the rains which descend in other countries, it requires constant and untiring labor here in a poor man, to supply himself and family with even the necessities of life. That the hard earnings rung from a reluctant soil, and from hands that are overtaken, should be taken from him under the shallow pretense of giving to the Lord, or building up the church, is an outrage that no language can adequately denounce. Yet this is precisely what is done here. The Mormon leaders, practising on the credulity of their followers have, trumped up a pretended revelation, in order to cloak their selfish acts under the name and sanction of religion, which enjoins upon all professors of the Mormon religion, to contribute one-tenth of all their earnings to the Mormon church; and this we have been told by Mormons themselves is not only taught as a religious duty, but in many cases, its payment has been actually compelled. This they term "tithing," and many a man and woman, too, no doubt, in this valley, have been compelled to obey this revelation, even though they were thereby deprived of the necessities of life. We have seen poor men here, who labored hard from day to day, dining off of cold bread and a few vegetables, without a morsel of meat, who have told us, that weeks and months sometimes passed away without their getting any; but who, notwithstanding their own privations, were required to come up regularly with the "tithing."

How men, under any pretext or plea, can be brought to submit to such imposition and injustice, is incomprehensible to us. We are well aware that any advice or opinion coming from us, will have no weight with them, or we should certainly be tempted to offer it; but anything that we may say will be looked upon as the words of an enemy seeking to injure them, and the church to which they belong. This, however, is not the case. We entertain no feeling of dislike or opposition towards any honest but misguided man, personally we are the friend of such, and would, if we had the power, relieve him from the shackles that bind his mind, as well as from the vultures that prey upon his substance. We conjure all such to stop and reflect before they submit to further robbery and extortion. Compare your course of life, gentlemen, with those who handle and consume your earnings. Who has labored most and toiled hardest? Yet, who revels in luxury and ease? And who submits oftener to privation and want? If it be a merit or a duty thus to deny oneself to contribute to the building up of the kingdom of the Lord, let those who profess to have received a revelation to that end, set the example of self-denial and privation, for this purpose, before they call upon you to do so. Otherwise you may well doubt the sincerity and honesty of the revelations which they teach but do not themselves practice.

What Has Become of the Funds.

We have been informed that in the years 1850 and '51, in consequence of Indian depredations in this Territory, a large number of the inhabitants here, formed themselves into a volunteer corps and served a campaign of several weeks against the Indians. Congress afterwards made an appropriation of several thousand dollars, reimbursing the Territorial government of Utah for expenses which it was represented she incurred in defraying the expenses and paying off this volunteer corps, and the money appropriated by Congress for this purpose, was paid over by the Treasurer at Washington on the draft of the Treasurer of the Territory. Notwithstanding which, we are informed that very few of these who thus served as volunteers, have ever been paid for the services which they rendered. Perhaps, some of those interested, would like to inquire into the matter and find out what became of the funds appropriated for their use; at all events, we throw out these suggestions for their benefit.

A portion of the Eastern mail consisting mostly of letters, arrived here on Sunday last; the bulk of the paper mail has not yet arrived. The latest dates received from Washington City, are to Jan. 16th. No Speaker had at that time been elected, at the last ballot of which we have an account, Sherman, (Rep) received 103 votes, and lacked but three votes of a majority of the entire number of votes cast. The reduction in the votes given, is probably owing to members of opposite sides having paired off. A terrible calamity occurred on the tenth of Jan., at Lawrence, Mass., by the falling of a large factory at which several hundred hands were at the time employed. Nearly all of them were of course buried in the ruins, and it was supposed that not less than 200 were killed, while very few that were in the building when it fell, escaped without injuries more or less severe.

Full particulars of the catastrophe will be found elsewhere in our paper.

We have received, in the last few days two communications from unknown sources; the writer of one of them adopting the very vague appellation of "A Mormon," and that of the other the equally indefinite title of "A large number of Mormons." Both of these communications were requested to publish, and as both of them were courteous in tone, and contained neither threats nor curses, we should certainly comply with the request of the authors if they had only accompanied their communications with their real names. The writers of both articles dissent with us in opinion, but to this we have no objection, and this is by no means the cause of the suppression of the communications sent us.

The weather for the past few days has been very pleasant, and the snow is fast disappearing under the genial rays of the sun. The nights, however, are still cool and it is near mid-day before the sun has much effect.

[For the Valley Tan.]

MR. EDITOR.—The reading of the report made by the Secretary of War, seems to have rekindled in the minds of the Mormon community that bitter feeling and revengeful spirit, which we thought had taken refuge behind the mantle of shame and conviction; but alas! these sullen and conquered people as the Secretary is pleased to call them, are now more envenomed than ever; and as soon as they see that the Secretary has signified his intention to remove a portion of his troops into another part of the country, where they will be of more service to the Government, the usual cant of "we could, or we might if we would," and other such trash is revived. The dark and wicked thoughts which for a time have been smothered, have again appeared and made apparent, by sundry petty annoyances and harsh threats, which tell but too plainly, that the policy once pursued, will again be brought to bear with two fold rigor upon those who remain in the valley, after the troops have departed. This, however, is counting chickens before they are hatched. The troops have not yet been removed, nor is it the opinion of many that they will be. Camp Floyd and Fort Bridger will always be garrisoned with a force sufficient to protect those who remain and require the protection of the United States Government. The suggestions of the Secretary in regard to the establishment of a military government, will, no doubt, be carried out to the very letter; and the fact of the Secretary of the Interior asking for no appropriation for the department of Utah, is conclusive, that all the money expended during the present year, will be disbursed through the War Department, for the purpose of intimidating and keeping within the bounds of proper subjection this penal settlement which has sprung up within the limits of our territory, whose wicked schemes and sacrilegious doctrines are calculated to destroy the peaceful harmony of her institutions. The cry of persecution that has so often raised in regard to these people, is false from the beginning; they have not been persecuted, not even punished for the wrongs committed against the citizens of the U. States. Although the disgusting practice of polygamy, alone, would warrant such a course, the liberal institutions of our Government have provided them with a home and protection; they have abused it, and as the case now stands, the United States are bound, both in honor and principle, to compel them to become subservient to the laws, or drive them from the country; since the organization of the Mormon church, thirty million of dollars has been expended. This money belongs to the people, and if one-fifth of that amount had been expended in the purchase of munitions of war, and properly applied, there would be less widows and orphans now in the country, and still less cause for complaint. The Government of the United States has been severely censured by most of the powers in Europe, and on the continent, for the mild course pursued towards these people, as they feel, most sensibly, the consequences of permitting any overt act of insubordination or treason to go unpunished.

The revolution occasioned by the atrocities committed by demagogues and the establishment of an ecclesiastical hierarchy in France was terrible, and felt in the remotest corners of the earth, and the tolerance of a religion in this country which permits one man to riot in luxury, while another famishes for bread, would, in time, destroy this republican form of government, and give birth to another reign of terror. There is a reflux in the tide of all human events, and that time has now come. Congress is now in session and must take some decisive action in this matter. Heretofore the leaders in both parties have been too sensitive in regard to public opinion, the question of praise or blame has caused them to shrink from the responsibility of such action as would end in the reducing of towns and villages to ashes, and causing the half naked inhabitants to sit famishing upon their desolate thresholds, mourning over a fate which, if realized, they will have brought upon themselves. The wicked men who have organized and brought this church into its present position of strength and power, know this fact. They have played upon the sympathies and good nature of the government until they can no longer endure it. They are well versed in that sophistry which is, after all, but a fatal substitute for those truths which are now made public. There is now on file at Washington, the damning evidence of such crimes as will convince Congress in what direction lies the path of duty. Those laws she had the power to make, she also has the power to repeal; this great right was vested in her for the purpose of doing good, and now is the time to do it. As soon as the Speaker-ship is settled, the territorial matters will come up. On the 9th, Mr. Green, of Missouri, gave notice that he would speak on this question: "The repeal of the Organic Act." The well known ability of this gentleman, and the influence he carries with him, will no doubt cause a great sensation among the members, and call for an investigation into the affairs of Utah, as will forever decide the question as to who is the most powerful, Brigham Young and the Mormon Church, or James Buchanan and the Congress of the United States.

THE LATEST NEWS.

FROM NEW YORK.

New York, Jan. 11.

The Times' Washington correspondent says the War Department is preparing for effective operations in the spring against the Indians, who are now committing depredations on the Santa Fe Mail route. Col. Sumner's command will furnish the forces. Col. Johnson's Utah command is to be ordered into Arizona in the spring. Letters from leading bankers in New York state that, owing to the non-organization of the House, post office scrip will not be purchased at higher rates than were paid six months ago.

Washington, Dec. 31.

L. B. Branch, member of Congress from North Carolina, was arrested at a late hour last night, on a warrant issued by Justice Dunn on a charge of being about to make arrangements to leave the District of Columbia, for the purpose of engaging in hostile conflict with G. A. Grow of Pa. He was held in $5,000 bonds for his appearance for further examination on Tuesday. Mr. Grow had yesterday engaged a hackman to call at the place designated, to take him and his party at 3 o'clock this morning, in the direction of silver springs, Md. The hackman did not keep the secret and hence the arrest. The principal friend of Branch in this affair, is Mr. Winslow, of N. C. and of Mr. Grow, the Hon. Mr. Fenton, of N. Y.

FROM MEXICO.

New Orleans, January 6.

The steamship Indianola, has arrived here, with Brownsville dates of the 2nd inst. Cortinas, with 500 men, took the city of Rio Grande on the 24th inst., having a number of citizens. Subsequently a body of troops and rangers, from Brownsville, attacked Cortinas and retook the city after a hard fight, capturing the guns of Cortinas and sixty Mexicans. Nine Americans were killed and sixteen wounded. Among the latter was Capt. Ford who led the attack. Cortinas fled across the river.

Later from Pike's Peak—$22,000 in Gold!

The Denver City Express, Mr. C. W. Wiley, messenger, arrived yesterday at one o'clock; seven days out from Denver, bringing the following passengers—W. D. Pease, of St. Joseph, Mo.; G. W. Clayton, of this city, and J. G. Lowe, of Denver City and $22,000 in gold, and the balance in the hands of passengers.

Mr. Wiley reports six inches snow on the South Platte.

The Rocky Mountain News says "there appears to be a determined effort on the part of some to break down the provisional government." The miners in the mountains have held meetings and unanimously resolved to resist every process claiming authority from the late Legislature, and repudiating any connection or fellowship with the movement. The principal cause of hostility is said to be the tax to be levied on the miners; other causes are complained of—among them the action of the Legislature in voting themselves ten dollars per day for their services during the term of the session.

Gov. Steele has issued his proclamation calling for an election of county officers on the 7th inst., and convening the Legislature at Denver, on the 23d.

The 25th December was set apart as Thanksgiving day.

A correspondent of the News writing from the Nevada district says,

"The effort on the part of the Denver City merchants to depress the value of gulch gold does not meet with the approbation of the miners of the gulches any more than the part played by the Golden Cityites in the recent 'John Brown' jollification, in which sooner or later, they will find that they have done their town no good. I can now cite them to hundreds who would stave rather than buy one pound of anything in the accursed town."

The correspondence from the mountains reports a general activity in the leads and tunnels, in getting out quartz and dirt preparatory to spring operations. All speak sanguinely of the great value of the anticipated return of gold in the spring.—Leavenworth Herald.

The Pike's Peak Express left yesterday morning for Denver. There were six passengers—The Rev. Mr. Keller, three daughters (all young ladies), one son, and a grand-daughter. We venture the assertion that the Express never took out a more valuable cargo, and the bachelors of the diggings will coincide with us. Mr. Keller goes out to establish an Episcopal Church. But little express freight was taken. The fare from this city to Denver is $100, and found.—Leavenworth Times.

CONGRESSIONAL.

Washington, Jan. 10.
House.—No vote for Speaker in session.

Mr. Garret said that no blame could be attached to democratic non-organizations, the scenes enacted here are but the beginning of an irrepressible conflict of which they bear so much, a conflict between the North and South, if war is to be waged in fifteen states of this Union, if they are to be denied the solemn guarantees of the constitution, if the property of the South is to be taken and surrendered refused, if the principles of the republican party are still to be maintained, and their purposes accomplished in the south by Congressional or other contrivances, or by unfriendly legislation, be deprived of full participation in the common interests belonging to the people of the U. S. He for one was free to confess that the House had better not organize if you Republicans, he said, are determined that his conflict shall come, then I warn you and those you represent to beware of that dangerous ground on which you stand. The South must have their full measure of constitutional rights. They will enforce their demand to be treated as political equals, otherwise the Union will be divided into as many parts as there are states on the national banner. He proceeded to show first what rights the southern people enjoy as to slavery.

Second that these rights so clear, sacred and high were not only threatened, but boldly, daringly and willfully assailed by the republican party. He would announce the solemn truth, disagreeable as it might be, of his constituents and those of many others, that if aggression continues, the people of the South will be compelled by every principle of justice, honor, and self preservation to disrupt every tie of Union peacefully, if we can, but forcibly if we must.

Mr. Haskell, during the speech of Mr. Garret, asked whether if the doctrine of Judge Douglas as to slavery in the territories be acted on he would therefore sustain the right to secede from the Union.

Mr. Garret wished to know whether Mr. Haskell was the champion and exponent of the republican doctrine.

Mr. Haskell said he was not in the contrary he was an antagonist of the republican doctrine of intervention in the territories for the prevention of slavery, he was also opposed to the newfangled southern doctrine of Congressional intervention for the protection of slavery.

Mr. Garret replied that was a judicial question for the courts.

From New Orleans.

New Orleans, Jan. 13.

Advices from Mexico by the Tennessee, state that the Juarez Government propose to organize a regular army and distant the volunteers and militia now employed, and also to invite volunteers and troops from abroad. The people along the National road had organized a vigilance committee and hung one hundred of the highwaymen who infested the road. Travel is now safe from Vera Cruz to the Capitol. The steamship Tennessee has been withdrawn from the route between this city and Vera Cruz.

The brig Carlotta has arrived from Guaymas with dates to December 10th.

It was reported that three Mexican war vessels are en route from Mazatlan to Guaymas, under the command of the intrepid Lorenzo Ariles, to rout the Americans from Sonora and blow the St. Mary's out of the water.

Mexican troops are concentrating at Guaymas in great numbers, to cut off all retreat by land, but the St. Mary's, under Captain Porter, bids defiance to their whole force. The guns are kept constantly loaded with ball, grape and bombs, ready for action, with every man impatiently waiting for an engagement. None of Captain Stone's party had yet arrived.

TELLING TALES OUT OF SCHOOL.

—Some man in Abington, Mass., took a call for a meeting of sympathy for John Brown, signed by twenty-two citizens mostly shoe dealers, and transmitted it to Charlestown, South Carolina, and it has been published in the Courier of that City.—The object was to let the Southern merchants know what base hypocrites they were dealing with.

The Senate of South Carolina has

finally adopted the following resolutions:

WHEREAS, The State of South Carolina, by her ordinance of 1852, affirmed her right to secede from the confederacy whenever an occasion should arise justifying her, in her own judgment, in taking that step, and in the resolution adopted by her convention, declared that she forbore the immediate exercise of that right, from considerations of expediency only; and

WHEREAS, More than seven years have elapsed since that convention adjourned, and in the intervening time the assaults upon the institution of Slavery, and the rights and equality of the Southern States, have unceasingly continued with increasing violence, and in new and more alarming forms, be it

Resolved, That South Carolina, with deference to her Southern sisters, nevertheless announces to them that in her judgment the safety and honor of the slaveholding States imperatively demand a speedy separation from the other States of the confederacy, and earnestly invites the slaveholding States of the South to inaugurate the movement of Southern separation, in which she pledges herself promptly to unite.

Resolved, That for the purpose of military preparation for any emergency, the sum of $100,000 be appropriated and placed at the disposal of the Government.

Resolved, That his Excellency, the Governor, be requested to transmit to the Governors of each of the other slaveholding States, a copy of the above resolutions, with the request that they be laid before their respective legislatures.

The Boston Herald, of Dec. 12th, states that the proprietor of the curio shop, corner of Washington and West streets, had a very narrow and almost miraculous escape from death last week. He was on his way to New York, in the train that ran over and killed a track repairer named "Say, near Palmer, Mass., and, with several others, got out of the train, which stopped immediately after Casey was run over. At the call, "All aboard," a general rush was made to gain the train.

At this moment he was attempting to step upon the car, when his foot slipped, and he fell violently forward, partly under the car. A pit was in the track just before him, and instead of trying to get upon the track again, with wonderful presence of mind he quickly threw himself into a ditch and allowed the remaining cars to pass over him. The train passed on and he was left behind, no attempt being made to pick him up. A friend of Salom, Cruch, sitting till then in the seat with him, noticed his absence at once, and suspecting some accident, besought the conductor to return, which he refused to do. Salom took the morning train from Springfield for New York, arriving there at 2 o'clock P. M., on Thursday, instead of 12 o'clock on Wednesday night. His overcoat, which was left on the rack over his seat, and which contained a considerable sum of money (over $1,000) was found safe at Charlie's Hotel, whither his friend had taken it.

We understand that the secretary of interior has applied to the Sac and Fox Indians, for a full Indian war dress, to be presented through the French minister, to Louis Napoleon. The tribe has most generously responded with a splendid equipment, including knife, tomahawk, peace-pipe, and various other articles of savage warfare. No expense has been spared by way of ornament and decoration. Maj. Perry Fuller, Indian agent, has superintended their collection and arrangement, and Hon. A. Davis, U. S. district attorney, is to convey them to Washington.—Topsa Tribuna.

Louis Napoleon has played every-thing else, and now he wants to play again.

EXTRAVAGANCE OF AN ENGLISH COLLEGE.—In the Cambridge County Court, in England, lately, a son of Sir Culling Eardley, the prominent dissenting English Baronet, was sued for a debt of $15, due to a photographer for sundry photographs. Upon the trial of the case, it appeared that the young man had incurred some $50.00 in debts for photographs and similar "trifles." Young Eardley is an under-graduate in Trinity College, and it certainly betrays a singular state of society that a young man should be allowed to run in debt to such an amount.

China and Japan News.

The following intelligence has been received by the Torrent at San Francisco:

MINISTER WARD IN JEDDO.—Ward, the United States Minister to China, taking passage in the Powhatan, visited Nagasaki and Jeddo. While the guest of Mr. Harris at Jeddo, the Prime Minister being informed of his being in the city and at the house of Harris, immediately informed him, in the most civil and cordial terms, that he should be happy to have an interview at his residence within the imperial inclosure, or castle, as "the Prohibited Hall" is usually called, which is about a quarter of a mile from the city, and at the same time the day and the hour. Ward of course was happy to accept the invitation, and the interview was accordingly held. The Prime Minister, upon Ward's arrival, inquired if it would be agreeable to him to see the other ministers also, and at the same time, and upon his expressing his great gratification in doing it, they were introduced and remained to the close of the interview, which lasted nearly two hours. The Prime Minister and all the others were most courteous, and seemed easy and at home in their new relations and duties, without any embarrassment, and showing good common sense as well as an admirable simplicity in manners and habits. The reception hall, which was close to the imperial palace, was remarkable only for its simplicity and neatness, while the refreshments served on the occasion were only a few sweetmeats, such as the Japanese are fond of. On both sides the interview was entirely pleasant and satisfactory, however unostentatious.—North China News, 22d October.

THE FUNDS OF THE U. STATES.—A late number of the Washington States contains an interesting article on the subject of investments in the United States funds. The question is asked, "What investments in the United States funds?" to which a pointed reply is made. Most of the dividends are paid in New York, and many of the names on the books are familiar as household words. Some are those of Europeans; others of West Indians, and even Asiatics. Barely a third of the public debt is held in this country. The bulk of it, we imagine, is held in continental Europe. One is not surprised to find the names of John J. Astor, Jacob Little, George Peabody, Wm. B. Astor, and such men, in the list of the creditors of the United States, but they and their countrymen are in the minority. The heaviest foreign creditor is Lord Overton, (the famous John Lloyd,) who has lent this country no less than three hundred and fifty thousand dollars. A Spanish lady, Mercedes de Layseca, is our creditor to the tune of two hundred thousand dollars, and a noble friend of hers, the Count Casa Montalvo y Castillo, draws six per cent. on one hundred thousand dollars. The brother of the king of Naples took fifty thousand dollars some years ago, and instructed his agent to invest the dividends, as they accrued, in the same security. He now owns seventy-five thousand dollars. His niece is registered as a creditor for over fifty thousand dollars.

THE WEAK POINT.—One of Governor Corwin's pungent witticisms, in his Brooklyn lecture, a few weeks since, was in contrasting "Young America" of today with "Young America" of twenty years ago. Said he:

Children of the present day, who were but three or four years old thought themselves endowed with more knowledge than their fathers had fifty years ago. Sir F. Bacon and Sir Isaac Newton, if they had children, they were born like other people's children, with gastric juice in their little stomachs, clamoring and crying for milk; and it was with respect to every other animal. He would relate to them a Mohammedan legend of the creation of man, which would exemplify what that gastric juice was. Mohammed had a way of carrying knowledge to three hundred millions of human beings. In order to get this knowledge of the creation of man, he mounted his horse, which he called "Abbo Rock," and the horse galloped up with him into the third heaven, and there he was told singular things. Among others he was told about the creation of man, something similar to what was found in the Book of Genesis, but not exactly the same. [Laughter.] He then learned that when God made men of red clay, and set him up to dry, as our artists' model busts [Laughter.] He sent for the Evil Spirit to give him his candid opinion about him. He said, for his devil, who was struck with admiration at so splendid a work. The devil told him it was the best piece of workman he had ever seen. [Laughter.] But, said Corwin, he (the devil) stepped up to the newly made man and touched him here (pointing to his stomach), and said, he (the devil) told Corwin, "It sounds hollow here." [Laughter.] "Yes," said the Maker, "That is the place for the stomach." "Oh," said the devil, "the stomach! Will he thirst like an ox?" "Yes," said Corwin, "Yes," "Well," said the devil, "it is here his weak point is—I'll attack him here." [Great laughter.]

DEATH AT THE EXACT AGE OF ONE HUNDRED YEARS.—A person named Roger Lorgos has recently died at Paris, at the age of 100, precisely, day for day and even hour for hour. It was at one o'clock in the afternoon of the 10th of December, 1759, that he was born, and at one o'clock, in the afternoon of the 10th of December, 1859, that he died. He was a very remarkable personage, having excelled as a painter, engraver, poet and musician; and yet he was totally unknown to the public, because he would never consent to exhibit or publish any of his productions.

He that cannot forgive others, breaks the bridge over which he cannot pass himself, for every man has need to be forgiven.

A VALUABLE PRESENT.—The Washington Star of Thursday last, says:

Minister Yancy, on his return from South America, was made the bearer of a magnificent present from Gen. Urquiza, President of the Argentine Confederation, to the Hon. James B. Bowlin, of Missouri, who was for some time the guest of Gen. U. on his return from Paraguay, and evidently won his kind regards. It consists of a massive gold snuff box, chased more exquisitely with carved ornaments than any jewelry we ever before saw. Around the rim of the top are set 42 large brilliants, (diamonds,) and upon raised (carved) initials of the recipient—J. B. B.—are set fifty-one smaller diamonds, covering them entirely. The box bears several inscriptions. On the inside of the lid—"En recuerdo de amistad, y aprecio Justo Jose de Urquiza," over the initials above referred to the words—"Al cuidano Americano, James B. Bowlin." On one end, "10 de Febrero, 1859," and on the other end the words, "San José, 23 de Febrero, 1859." It is said to have been made in Rio de Janeiro, and to have cost $5,000.

Mr. Bowlin, who is in Missouri, is probably even yet unaware of the existence of this testimony of President Urquiza's personal regard for him; for it will be remembered that he held no official intercourse with, or relation whatever to, the Argentine Republic, when representing this Government in South America. President U., with becoming delicacy, thus waited until Mr. Bowlin became again a private citizen before sending him this so valuable token of his appreciation of him as a friend.

THE STATE OF GEORGIA.—No State in the Union is in so good a financial and economical condition as Georgia. Her people are well governed; her expenditures light, and the taxes on her people a trifle, the railroads pay a handsome yearly income into her treasury; her agriculturists are spirited; her improvements flourishing; her trade wholesome and her citizens prosperous and contented. Pauperism is almost unknown, the pauper tax unfeared, and crime much below the average of any other State. Her steady industry would seem to be the rule and wild business ventures the rare exception. The prosperous, easy, cheerful aspect they present speaks volumes for their institutions and government. It cannot be an ill tree that bears such good fruits.

There are many ways of raising the wind in a city like New York. The following is the latest that the police court has brought to light: A fellow named Samuel Smith, an Englishman, had been coachman to many gentlemen in Gotham, and had fared sumptuously in their several kitchens. From some cause he found himself without a situation, and what troubled him still more, without his accustomed good dinners. He hit on the following expedient for supplying the inner man. Watching the newspapers, he would note the applicants for situations as housekeepers, chambermaids and the like, and dropping in at the assigned places for calling, would engage the applicant forthwith, get her to pack up her effects, and accompany him to a car depot or steamboat landing for the purpose of going to his residence, which he represented was in some one of the numerous suburban towns. He would then dispatch her to some neighboring store or office, on some trifling errand, and during her absence would slip off with her baggage. By pawning or selling the appropriated articles, he has managed for a month or more to live, as he expressed it, "like a fighting cock." By his own confession, he has played this game on more than forty poor women, with a net profit to himself of over two hundred dollars. But villainy, like better things, must have an end, and Mr. Smith stole one carpet bag too many. He was arrested, identified, and now, on plain prison fare, deplores his indiscretion.

The Elmira Gazette says that Hazlett, one of the Harper's Ferry insurgents, was formerly connected with a gang of horse thieves in that vicinity, and escaped punishment by turning State's evidence.

This is a specimen of the martyrs who are to make "the gallows as glorious as the cross."

Bonnie Bell.

Like two rosebuds crushed in snow
Are the cheeks of Bonnie Bell,
Like the violets that grow
Among the daisies in the dell
Are her eyes—the stars of night
Never a mortal heart did swell
With such pure and fond delight
As the eyes of Bonnie Bell.

Music trembles on the lip
Of the fancy Bonnie Bell;
Oh! I'd give such sweets to sip,
Wealth that Ceresus ne'er could tell;
I would coin my brain and soul,
Cold the mintage buy a spell
That would wait me to my goal—
Wait and win me Bonnie Bell!

As the sound of silver bells,
Is the voice of Bonnie Bell
Wit, like bubbles on the wine,
Pure as pearls in ocean shell,
Sparkle through her golden theme;
Joyful as a marriage bell
I could glide down life's stream
In one boat with Bonnie Bell.

A Wife—A Home to go to.

Beautiful, inexpressibly beautiful definition, suggestive of gentleness, affection, rest. Yes, rest and home. Even I—who have been a wanderer all my life long—who have never had a fireside all my own—mine to be sat by with a second self dearest, if possible, than the fireside—even I, lingering over that phrase, can scarcely reconcile myself to the fact that I am not, to some fond and faithful heart, that being "to go home to." Even I, can shut my eyes and dream of that which would be a blessed reality.

I can see a cottage which love has made holy, nestling away in the sunny summer leaves, where the golden glory of sunset lingers longest, and the shadows reach latest. I can see the gentle wife, with her soft sweet face, gazing out of the open door, and down the lane to the turnpike, where he is momentarily expected to appear. I can hear the hum of children's voices, and feel the pressure of cool, fresh kisses, which come only from children's lips. I can read in the sudden flashing of her eye, that there is a step not far distant for her impatient ear to distinguish; and now I can see him, that impetuous, worldly man, leaving the world and its cares behind him, and up his knees for kisses; there are peace, quietude, home, all around him, and the worldly man, with the dust of city life on his spirit, with the knowledge of city cares and city speculations teeming in his brain, turns from them all to find rest and repose in the nook he has set apart for love!—God bless him and God bless her—imaginary though they are; for while I mine their perfect love and content, I am remembering that I am still a wanderer—a wanderer with the knowledge that, had fate been more propitious, I too, might have had my loving heart, my sunny home and my loving children. But fate was inexorable, and were all this happiness might have been, he stark and bare before me the panorama of two wasted lives. "God help us all—we are not the architects of our own fortunes, let moralists say what they may."

I know that the world is full of homes that are no homes, of wives upon whose artificial hearts no true husband could call for sympathy, or mothers upon whose bare, jewelled necks there is no room for childhood's fondling arms. I know all this, but I cannot realize that it is so! Love seems to me so sacred, marriage so holy a tie that man and woman's life should not be completed without it. Not the wild, fierce, persistent love which burns itself out in its own fire—not the marriage of circumstance or convenience to which so many lives are devoted, but the pure, true lasting love—the wedding of souls that have grown indissolubly to each other—the uniting of hearts that neither time nor distance, nor misfortune can effect—a union of soul, sense and spirit, sure as death, and lasting as eternity. Pitiful, oh, pitiful, that there is no more such unions! "A being to go home to." Only the heart of man can tell how truly, in every life, such a being is needed. No matter how self centered, or preoccupied—no matter how hardened down with the perplexities of life, there come yearnings for that rapturous human love, dreamings of fond lips, warm loving arms, and anticipations of a time to come, when our hearts shall beat for him and him only.

Lucky for him who, amidst the unreal and artificial glare of life, gathers to his bosom this pearl of greatest price. Lucky for him who, when the tempest of care and worldly responsibility rage most fiercely, can feel that when the tiresome toil is over, and the day is done, he has "a being to go home to," who can minister to his comfort and sympathize with his cares. The man who has a wife that he truly loves, can make up his mind that he has anticipated the millennium commenced his paradise on earth.

Woman's veneration.

If women have one weakness more than men, it is towards veneration. They are born worshippers—makers of silver shrines from some divinity or other, which, of course, they always think fell straight down from heaven. The first step towards their falling in love with an ordinary mortal is generally to dress him out with all manner of real or fancied superiority; and having made him up, they worship him. Now, a truly great man, a man really grand and noble in art and intellect, has this idol ready made to hand; and so that very painstaking and ingenious sex have less labor in getting him up, and can be ready to worship him on shorter notice. In particular is this the case where a sacred profession and a moral supremacy are added to tee intellectual. Just think of the career of celebrated preachers and divines in all ages. Have they not stood like the image that "Nebuchadnezzar the King set," and all woman kind, coquets and flirts not accepted, been ready to fall down and worship, even before the sound of cornet, flute, harp, sacbut, and so forth?

Is it not the faithful Paula, with beautiful face, prostrate in reverence before the poor, old, lean, haggard, dying Jerome, in the most splendid painting in the world, an emblem and a sign of woman's eternal power, self-sacrifice to what she deems noblest in man? Does not old Richard Baxter tell us, with delightful single-heartedness, how his wife fell in love with him first, spite of his long pale face; and how she confessed, dear soul, after many years of married life, that she had found him less than they know what to do with; they stand like a hedge of sweet peas, throwing out fluttering tendrils everywhere for something high and strong to climb up by, and when they find it be it ever so rough in the bark, they catch upon it. And instances are not wanting of those who turned away from the flattery of admirers to prostrate themselves at the feet of a genuine hero who never wooed them except by heroic deeds and the rhetoric of a noble life.

A HISTORICAL OWL.—A very distinguished occupant of the fortress of Arundel Castle has lately expired. It was a very old owl. Many years ago some very fine specimens of the horned owl were introduced into the keep by the then Earl of Arundel; and their descendants have continued to occupy a place in this ancient building up to the present period. There are now seven birds in all, the oldest of eight having just passed away at the patriarchal age of about two hundred years. This bird must have been hatched in the reign of George II. She was supposed to have been the famous Lord Thurlow of the keep, in connection with which a ludicrous anecdote is told, which we will repeat: It was formerly the custom of the castellan to give each of these birds a name; and from their singularly wise appearance they were invariably named after some celebrated dignitary of the law. One was called Lord Eldon, and the subject of this notice was dubbed Lord Thurlow, we presume in total ignorance of the sex of the bird, which was in reality that of the feminine gender. It happened at one time that the famous Chancellor, Lord Thurlow, was ill, and much political anxiety was felt at the circumstance. The Duke of Norfolk was desirous of learning the latest intelligence respecting the learned man; and as he was riding one day into the gateway of the castle, the attendant ran up to him out of breath, exclaiming:

"Please your grace, Lord Thurlow—"

"Well," said the Duke, sharply, "what news—is he better or worse?"

"Oh! please your grace," replied the man, "just laid an egg."

As may be supposed, it is quite an event for an egg to be deposited by these aristocratic birds. They do not average among them one a year, and it is seldom that they are productive. The last bird, however, is one of the finest of the collection, this was hatched about six or seven years ago. The oldest denizen of the keep is now 63 years of age.—The famous Lord Thurlow owl, which has just expired, has been blind for 25 years.—London Dispatch.

A very celebrated lawyer was old Squire Johns. Being a man of influence and withal a very crusty old gentleman, when aroused he generally did as he pleased in court. He was once trying a case, the opposing counsel being a smart young lawyer named Davis, who so worried the old gentleman that he commenced cursing and swearing most outrageously in court. Such a contempt could not be overlooked by the court, but Squire Johns was a man of so much influence and consequence that the court could not think of punishing him. So the wise justices, after putting their heads together, announced that they would send Squire Davis to jail if he did not stop making Squire Johns swear so.

"Gentlemen of the Jury," said an Arkansas lawyer, "would you set a rat trap to catch a bear? would you make fools of yourselves by endeavoring to spear a buffalo with a knitting needle? No, gentlemen, I am sure you would not. Then how can you be guilty of the gross absurdity of finding my client guilty of manslaughter for taking the life of a woman?"

Where furs have been laid away for some months they acquire an old squeezed appearance, which may be remedied in a great measure as follows: Warm some new bran or fine sawdust in a pan, but do not let it burn; then rub it thoroughly into the fur with the hand. Repeat this two or three times; then shake and brush the fur until free from dust.

FAILURE IN NEW YORK.—John N. Genin, the New York hatter, who first rendered himself famous by paying an almost fabulous sum for a ticket to Jenny Lind's concert, has suspended, with, it is said, large liabilities. The misfortune is said to have occurred yesterday morning, for Denver and Auraria. There being a large quantity of express and mail matter, no passengers went out with it.

The arrival and departure of the Express is looked for with considerable interest, particularly the former. When the Express arrives in the day time, a crowd always gathers about the Express office to learn the news. The Pike's Peak Express is different to any other Express extant. There is a great profusion of buffalo robes and blankets; all the passengers are almost smothered with fixings to keep out the cold. There is not a bit of crinoline about the coach—nothing but long-bearded, rough-looking men.

After the usual shaking of hands, the crowd begin to look for the unloading of the bag of "dust," which is always the first thing unloaded. The crowd must, one by one "heft" the sack, to judge the number of dollars worth of dust that it contains. Then comes the unloading of the coach, which consists of buffalo robes and blankets almost without number; part of a sack of crackers, a bundle of dirty clothes; boots, caps, coats, shawls, leggings, books, novels, and other conveniences too numerous to mention, are brought out.

CURIOUS SENTENCE.—A foreign exchange gives an account of a curious sentence which has been passed at Unterwalden, Switzerland:

A prisoner was put to the bar, charged with disturbing the public order. The offence being proved, he was sentenced to a month's imprisonment, and to a regular attendance at the morning and afternoon religious services for two years. Which he considers the worst sentence, the paper does not inform us.

Nobody can Have seen It.

Fast down de staircase swinging,
With flying feet I passed,
Quick up de staircase springing,
He came and caught me fast;
And de stairs are dark and dim,
Many a kiss I had from him,
And nobody can have seen it.

Down into de hall demurely—
The guests were assembled there,
My cheeks flushed hot, and surely
My lips did their tale declare.
I thought that they looked at me, every one,
And saw what we together had done—
Yet nobody could have seen it.

The garden its sweets displaying,
Beckoned me out of doors;
The welcome call obeying,
I hastened to look at the flowers,
There blushed the roses all around,
There sang the birds with merry sound,
As if they had seen it.

AWFUL CALAMITY.Over 300 Persons Killed.

LAWRENCE, MASS., Jan. 10. One of the most terrible catastrophes on record occurred in this city this afternoon. The Pemberton Mills fell with a sudden crash at about 5 o'clock, while some six or seven hundred operatives were at work. The mills are a complete wreck. Some two or three hundred persons are supposed to still be in the ruins. At present it is impossible to give anything like a correct statement of the loss of life; but from the best authority, it is believed that at least two hundred are dead in the ruins. Eighteen dead bodies have already been taken out, together with some 25 persons mortally wounded, besides some 50 in different stages of mutilation. Mr. Chase, the agent of the mill, and Mr. Howe, the treasurer, escaped by running from the falling building. It is impossible as yet to tell the cause of the disaster.

Our reporter has just come from the ruins, and the scenes there beggar all description. Some two or more acres of ground are piled up with every description of machinery of the fallen buildings.

Huge bonfires are burning to light some two or three thousand persons, who are at work, as if for their lives, to rescue the unfortunate persons, many of whom are still crying, and begging to be released from their tortures. Every few minutes some poor wretch is dragged from his prison; and it is heart-rending to hear their cries, as they are drawn out with legs and arms crushed and torn. One man, shockingly mangled, cut his own throat to end his agony.

The whole city seems to be in mourning. Many are running thro' the streets, and others, with frantic cries, are searching the ruins. Temporary hospitals have been arranged for those rescued. Many stand by the wreck frigid with despair.

Another terrible crash, caused by the clearing away, threatened death to all who may still be alive in the ruins.

Gen. H. K. Oliver is conspicuous and active in directing those persons who are endeavoring to rescue the victims of the disaster.

Gangs of men with ropes below are constantly dragging out huge pieces of the wreck which imprison so many persons. Some of the rescuers were killed in their humane efforts.

Since we left the scene of disaster, reports of more of the dead and dying are constantly coming to us. Surgeons are coming in from all directions, and everything that can be done at such a painful moment is doing for the suffering victims of the fatal calamity, the mystery of which will have to be cleared up by an inquest.

SECOND DISPATCH.

11:30 P. M. — At about ten minutes after 5 o'clock this p. m. our citizens were warned by the cry of fire, which proceeded from the Pemberton Mills, about four-fifths of which had fallen, a shapeless mass, without the slightest warning to the nearly 800 human beings who were then at work. The building was never considered to be as staunch as it ought to be. It was built about seven years ago, and then was thought a sham. Indeed, before the "machinery" was put in, the walls spread to such an extent that some twenty-two tons of iron slats were put in to save it from falling by its own weight. It fell inwards. The fire department at once repaired to the spot, but there being no fire, they at once set to work with a will to remove the rubbish. They soon reached some rooms, so that the dead and wounded were taken out as fast as they could be reached.

Mr. Chas. Bachelor helped remove some 26, in various conditions—some still living.

Mr. Branch, the overseer, has not been found.

The City Hall has been converted into a temporary hospital for the dead and wounded till recognized.

Mr. Palmer was deeply buried in the ruins all the time, and thinking there was no prospect of being extricated, cut his throat to end his sufferings. Still he was taken out, and lived some time.

One woman, in the part of the mill still standing, became frightened, and threw herself out of the fifth story door, breaking an arm, and injuring herself so that she cannot recover.

The laboring force of the mill is about 960; and it is supposed that about 700 human beings were actually buried in the ruins.

A woman, just rescued, says there are some 25 more in the vicinity of her yet alive.

About half past 9 fire was discovered. This additional horror struck terror to the hearts that had before been hopeful of saving more lives. Still the work of removal went on. The force pumps and engines on the ground were at once got to work and have been pouring torrents on, so that at 11:30 p. m., the fire does not seem to gain, and hopes are entertained that it will be stayed.

Those near the breaking out of the fire were almost on the point of extricating a woman, not much hurt, but the flames drove them back, and the woman, it is supposed, perished.

The mayor has telegraphed for the Lowell firemen, who will arrive about 1 o'clock.

MIDNIGHT.

Through the almost superhuman efforts of the firemen, the Washington Mills are now considered safe.

Of the Duck Mill, the prospect is not so good.

Every thing that can be done is being done.

Fire companies are present from all the neighboring towns.

Between forty and fifty physicians are in attendance at the City Hall, and other places wherever he injured need their services.

The ruins having burned up, it will be many days before a true knowledge of the number of the killed and wounded can be arrived at.

The fire which finally sacrificed the buried human victims caught, without doubt, from a lantern of burning fluid, which was accidentally dropped.

One fireman dropped down dead in the streets.

The streets are filled with a mass of human beings. Friends who, before the fire, were alternating between hope and fear, are now settling down in hopeless despair.

In ten minutes the whole mass of ruins has become one sheet of flames. The screams and moanings of the poor buried creatures can be distinctly heard, but no power can save them.

The Pemberton Mills are now a black smoking mass of brick, mortar and humanity, promiscuously mingled. Probably not less than two hundred beings perished in the flames.

ADDITIONAL FROM LAWRENCE, MASS.

LAWRENCE, MASS., Jan. 11.

A portion of the operatives had left for supper previous to the falling of the building, 600 remaining. The building was five stories, 250 feet long by 70 wide, with a wing on the west side 45 feet square, sloped like the letter L. It ran 2,700 spindles, and 960 operatives were employed. The following is a list of the killed and wounded, as far as can be recognized this morning: [Here follows a long list of names]

Three persons are known to have been roasted alive. Eliza Dow has since died, and others are dying. The fire is subdued. Only two bodies have been taken out since the conflagration. Coroner Lamb commenced an inquest today. The building was insured.

LATER.

We have very little additional in regard to the dreadful catastrophe. A large portion of the killed were young girls, many of them being the main support of their parents.

The fire was confined to the ruins of the Pemberton Mills. The loss of property is estimated $600,000.

The Mayor has issued the following notice:

"Terrible as our calamity has been, I think it is much over-estimated in the number killed. As near as I have been able to ascertain this morning, I find the dead and missing, which is equivalent to 115 dead and 160 wounded. Some of the number will die, but very much the larger number will survive.

(Signed) N. SAUNDERS, Mayor.

(The summing up shows that 132 persons are missing. This embraces all those known to have been killed and those of whom no tidings have been obtained. It is admitted by those who have gone into the investigation, that 52 persons are yet buried beneath the brick and mortar of the ruins. One hundred and thirty dead bodies have been removed to the City Hall, or been delivered to recognizing friends.)

BOSTON, JAN. 11.

The Lawrence catastrophe casts a gloom over the city. The Hon. David Sears presided at a meeting of twenty gentlemen to-day, who subscribed $2,000 for the relief of the sufferers, and appointed a committee to solicit further contributions.

Trains to Lawrence are crowded. A strong force of reporters are on the ground, and accounts received are voluminous, but really afford little news.

A jury was summoned, who after receiving the dead, adjourned till tomorrow. The insurance on the Pemberton Mills was $415,000, said to be against fire only.

THE F. F. V.'s.—A good story is told a literary gentlemen from San Francisco, who honored our town with his presence for a few days last week. Entering the office of a legal gentleman of his acquaintance, who was busily engaged at the time in preparing some important document, the city gent, not wishing to interrupt his friend, took a seat by the table and commenced conning over the papers. At length, picking up a copy of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, containing a likeness of Osawatimie Brown, the gentlemen from below broke silence, and the following colloquy ensued:

City Gent—Old Brown has been raising hell with the Virginians!

Lawyer—Yes.

City Gent—I reckon if he'd had a hundred men he would have completely annihilated the F. F. V's.

Lawyer—Yes, I've no doubt of it.

City Gent (after a pause)—Mr. what State are you from?

Lawyer—Virginia.

City Gent—Indeed! What part of Virginia?

Lawyer—From Shenandoah valley, about 20 miles from Harper's Ferry.

The gentleman from below made no direct reply; but, after humming a popular air for a few seconds, he got up, drew a long breath, and remarking, in the most absent-minded manner possible, "My mammy was from Virginia," walked out of the office. — Nevada Democrat, Dec. 28th.

Mrs. Jenkins complained in the evening that the turkey she had eaten at Thanksgiving did not eat well.

"Probably," said Jenkins, "It was not a hen turkey." He got a glass of water in his face.

GOOD FOR THE NEWSBOYS.—The New York Sun tells how the New York Newsboys kept their Thanksgiving:

The newsboys had a pleasant time. About sixty sat down to an excellent dinner of roast beef and turkey, after which followed pies and fruit. The greatest harmony and good fellowship prevailed, and ample justice was done to the plentiful repast provided for them by their generous friends. After the cloth was removed, the newsboys were addressed by Messrs. C. Wiegand and J. Macy, of the Children's Aid Society. One of the newsboys returned thanks on the part of his companions. His humorous manner elicited much merriment. We give an extract of his speech.

"Ladies and gentlemen—I am a newsboy, and an honorable member of this far-famed institution—this nursery of Congressmen and eminent characters in all departments of genius in this great Republic. [Hurrah.] Permit me to return thanks to the good people who gave us this very superior dinner. A good dinner on Thanksgiving Day is like a good conscience—it makes one feel happy. I tell you, ladies and gentlemen, that we, the newsboys of New York, are not so bad as some people think we are; but the newsboy who is not honorable cannot come up to the lofty position of our club in the top story of the Sun building.

"Ladies and gentlemen, I see on the walls around me the signs of our profession—the newspapers. We work hard for the proprietors to make them rich, and I am sorry to say that many of them never pay us a visit. I see the Sun and Tribune have often a good word for us, and the Times, our friend, too, and the Observer, the poor boys' real friend.

"Ladies and gentlemen, excuse me, as I am but a poor stump orator, and only an apprentice to public speaking. When I get to college and go to Congress, I'll do better. I wish you all many happy Thanksgiving days—and don't forget us on New Year's Day."

The oldest church now existing in the United States, is one near Smithfield, Isle of Wight county, Virginia.

It was built in the reign of Charles I. between the years 1607 and 1609.

The brick, lime and timber, were imported from England. The timber is English oak, and was framed in England. The structure is of brick, erected in the most substantial manner. The mortar has become so hardened that it will strike fire in collision with steel.

A SINGULAR CASE OF SUDDEN RESTORATION OF HEARING AND SPEECH.—A young man named Joseph Wheeler, who has been deaf and dumb for some four years back, and who has been looked upon as a kind of pet by Lieut. Gastinel, of the Second District Police, where he slept at night, was, through the means of an accident, yesterday, perfectly restored.

During the firing of the salute yesterday in front of Jackson Square, he went up very near to the mouth of the cannon, and before those around could interfere to take him away, the cannon was touched off, and the concussion knocked him down, throwing him fifteen feet. He was picked up senseless, and taken over to the police station, where some water was sprinkled on his face.

To the utter surprise and astonishment of all around, as soon as he opened his eyes, spoke as fluently as anybody, and heard and answered all questions put to him, and is, up to this time, retaining language out in large doses, to the astonishment of a crowd of incredulous lookers on. — [N. O. Delta, 27th.

Deborah Lee.

BY FUZZY GUSZY.

[Those who have read Poe's "Annabel Lee" will appreciate the following parody, as exquisite in kind as was the original of that gifted genius whose lamp was soon extinguished:—Cincinnati Commercial.]

Tis a dozen or so of years ago,
Somewhere in the West country,
That a nice girl lived, as ye Hoosiers knew,
By the name of Deborah Lee;
Her sister was loved by Edgar Poe,
But Deborah by me.

Now I was green, and she was green,
As a summer's squash might be,
And we loved as warmly as other folks,
I and my Deborah Lee—
With a love that the lassies of Hoosierdom
Coveted her and me.

But somehow it happened a long ago,
In the ageish West country,
That a chill March morning gave the shakes.

To my beautiful Deborah Lee;
And the grim steam doctor (curse him)
Came,
And bore her away from me—
The doctor and death old partners they—
In the ageish country.

The angels wanted her up in Heaven,
(But they never asked for me.)
And that is the reason, I rather guess,
In the ageish West country,
That the cold March wind and the doctor
and death.

Took off my Deborah Lee—
My beautiful Deborah Lee—
From the warm sunshine and the opening flower,
And took her away from me.

My love was as strong as a six-horse
team,
The love of folks older than we,
Possibly wiser than we,
With the aid of doctor and steam,

Was rather too many for me;
I leaped the peepers and silenced the breath.

Of my sweetheart, Deborah Lee,
And her form lies cold in the prairie
mold,
Silent and cold—ah, me!

The foot of the hunter shall press her grave,
And the prairie's sweet wild flowers,
In their odorous beauty around it wave,
Through all the sunny hours;

The still, bright summer hours;
And birds shall sing in the tufted grass,
And the nectar-laden bee,
And his dreary hum on his gauze wings
pass—

Wakes no more to me;
Never more to me!
The wild birds sing and the wild flowers spring,
Wakes no more to me.

In the hush of the dim, still night,
Of beauty I see,
Light to my bedside—a phantom
bright,

Beautiful Deborah Lee—
Gone that was to be,
I awake to mourn that the doctor
and death.

Of my darling Deborah Lee—
Adorable Deborah Lee;
That angels should want her in Heaven
Before they wanted me!

Interesting Description of Nauvoo and its Tem- ple—The Icarians.

Nauvoo the Mecca of the modern Muslims, and the New Jerusalem of the Latter-Day Saints, in the natural beauty of its position is without an equal on the river. Seated at the head of the Rapids, on a point of land around which the river sweeps
in a gentle curve, it commands a view of the stream extending many miles without interruption in either direction. Rising with a gentle swell from the river's bank, the land gradually grows more elevated as you recede, until it reaches its culmination in a lofty eminence on which the Temple once reared its proud proportions in stately grandeur. All along the hill-side, in the days of the city's prosperity, rows of handsome edifices were terraced, the ruins only of which may now be seen. But the days of its prosperity are past, and ruin now meets you on every hand. The place now presents the strange anomaly of a city of recent origin built of ruins, and reared in the midst of desolation. Before the Mormons were driven away the population exceeded thirty thousand;

and now not a tenth of that number can be found in the place. Many times more building have been pulled down than are now standing, and many still remain that have no other tenants than rats and owls.

The chief object of interest that the place contains is of course the Temple, or what remains of it. It stands, as has been already observed,
on the summit of the hill that overlooks the city, and is a conspicuous object at the distance of many miles.
Years ago, it was destroyed by fire,
and only the front walls are now left standing. When in its perfect state it must have presented a very imposing appearance. The material used in its construction is limestone, obtained in the neighborhood, and of most excellent quality. The portion now standing is about sixty feet in height, and constitutes the portico, or hall of entrance into the building.

On either side of the doorway, three pilasters are inserted, their bases resting on a crescent moon, the caps surmounted by a rising sun. Just above the sun a pair of hands appear,
each holding with firm grip a trumpet, and high above sun, and hands
and trumpet, a star of enormous magnitude scatters its divergent rays.—
Of what these symbols are typical,
those only who have been admitted into the mysteries of Mormonism can explain. The Temple, as we have stated, is in a state of dilapidation and ruin. The portion not already fallen is tottering to its base, and huge cracks gape along the walls
from top to bottom. We passed, with some misgivings of accident, beneath a ruined archway, and stood within the vestibule. A flock of partridges that had been feasting at a neighboring wheat-stack, and were now seeking refuge within the building from the heat of the noon-day
sun, were frightened at our intrusion, and darted, with tumultuous haste and whirring sound, through the gaping windows. The place where we stood was filled with masses of stone. In the spot underneath them, we were told, yawned a deep pit, the uses of which were known only to the initiated. Its mouth was covered by an enormous stone slab
that formed part of the pavement, and until the pit was revealed by the destruction of the building, its very existence had not been suspected.— Heaps of stone rubbish, filling its depths and piled high above it, have obliterated all traces of it now, and effectually choked its utterance, if it had any secret to disclose.

On either side of the vestibule are small rooms, from which circular stairways ascended to the Great Hall, which was in the second story.
After the expulsion of the Mormons,
this Hall was used for balls, public meetings and the like secular, not to say profane purposes, and was held in great regard by the citizens for such uses. The congregation "worshipped" in a large room on the first floor, which extended the whole depth of the building. In the basement beneath was the Baptismal Font, which was supported on twelve oxen hewn out of solid stone. No trace of this font or of the oxen is left, only the well over which it stood remains. We removed one of the planks that covered the well and looked down into its depths, but nothing was to be seen but water; water and a solitary frog, that lay floating at its ease, with limbs lazily extended, but who quickly disappeared
when his privacy was invaded.

All around in every direction the ground is thickly strewn with broken stone. An enormous amount of material must have been used in the construction of the building. Two large houses have already been built from its ruins, and enough still remains to furnish material for the erection of two or three others equally extensive.

Within a stone's throw of this Fane, dedicated to a heathenish fa-naticism, and now happily a mass of shapeless ruins, a Christian temple lifts its modest spire, and looks with an eye of pitying wonder on the humiliating witness of man's folly
and his blasphemous presumption.

The family of the great Prophet still dwell in Nauvoo. No persuasions can prevail on them to remove to Utah. His widow has married again, and with her husband keeps the Mansion House, the only house

of entertainment that the city affords.
The oldest son, who bears his father's name of "Joseph," is a justice of the peace, and a useful and very respected citizen. Great inducements have been offered him to remove to Great Salt Lake City, but he steadily resists all such importunities.

For the purpose of gratifying a curiosity general, if not commendable, we asked to be shown the spot where the Prophet was buried; but received for answer that the grave of Joe Smith like the sepulchre of Moses, was known to no one; to no one at least, except the immediate family, who keep the knowledge of it a profound secret.

The Mormon Temple, with the buildings adjacent, were purchased some years ago, by an association in New York, with the design of devoting them to purposes of education.
The night preceding the day that the transfer was to have taken place,
the Temple was set on fire and destroyed. With it perished the prospects of Nauvoo. From that day the town has declined. The origin of the fire is still a mystery. Some attribute it to the fanaticism of the Mormons themselves, who could not bear to see their sacred edifice pass into the hands of unbelieving gentiles;
others charge the act on the heretical
and disaffected among the Mormons,
while yet others, taking a more business view of the matter, are sure that the destruction of the building may be traced to the jealousy felt by the rival towns in the neighborhood of the rising greatness of Nauvoo.—
It is not likely that the origin of the fire will ever be discovered; all that is known is that it was the act of an incendiary.

A community of Icarians, under the leadership of M. Cabbe, their founder, soon afterwards removed to the place, and became the purchasers of the property. The Icarians are French Socialists, and hold all property in common. On two sides of Temple square their dwellings have been erected, on the other side they have built their store-houses and their school-houses, the latter out of the ruins of the Temple.

They numbered at first about six hundred persons, but by death and desertions the community has been reduced to less than three hundred.
Their leader, M. Cabbe, died about a year ago, since that his place has been supplied by M. Marchant.— Socialism they say is the only true democracy, and this they profess to practise in letter and in spirit. All are required to work, and the position of leader carries with it no exclusive privileges. When we were presented to M. Marchant, we found him in a cook's dress, busily engaged in preparing dinner for the whole community. Their number at present at Nauvoo is small, not exceeding fifty or sixty, the others of the community being in Adams county, Iowa, where they hold a large tract of land. Some few are at Cheltenham, near this city, where they are engaged in the manufacture of fire brick. The property of the community in Nauvoo has been sold,
and in December the whole society
will be united on their farm in Iowa.
All the time that they have been in Nauvoo, they have been distinguished for industry, neatness and good conduct, and barring their peculiar notions of government and religion, they are good citizens and excellent neighbors.—Mo. Repub.

A NEW DRINK.—The Evening Post says that they have a new drink in New York, which it describes as follows:

"Minnie-rifle brandy, killing two hundred yards, off-hand, must yield in potency to tangle foot whiskey, a drink now in general use. It is made of diluted alcohol, nitric acid, boot-legs and tobacco, and will upset an individual at the distance of four hundred yards from the demijohn containing it."

"You are an old sheep," said a Promising specimen of young America to his mother. "Well, you little rascal," exclaimed she, seizing the broomstick, "if I am an old sheep, I lam'd you, and I'll lam you again."
—[Louisville Journal.]

Death's Doings in 1859.

The Philadelphia N. American says: The festivities which cheer the departure of the year and hail the advent of its successor, should not render us forgetful of the fact that another landmark of time has been reached, and that we have so much less of our pilgrimage here to perform. Since the beginning of the year, upwards of twenty-five millions of human beings have passed away from the scene of their joys and their sorrows. Upon them Time has conferred immortality—perhaps an "immortality of ill!" They have been initiated into the awful mystery of the change from life to death, from death to life again. As they have sown so shall they reap. But our present concern is not with the eternal destiny of this mass of human beings, equalling in number nearly the population of the United States; it is with the earthly immortality which bids fair to attach to a small, and but an incredibly small, fraction of it. A humiliating thought it is that, out of so many millions, scarcely five hundred will be remembered by the next generation—that not more than one man in fifty thousand makes his mark. The past year has removed from among us some of those whose mighty minds have shown them to be the sons of Heaven, whose names are for all time: Literature, the physical sciences, the fine arts, the political world, the commercial world, the social sphere, each and all have experienced losses for which time will not make amends.

The scientific world has suffered more severely than any other. John Pringle Nichol, the accomplished author of the "Architecture of the Heavens," and William Cranch Bond, of Yale College, head the list of losses in the astronomical world. The month of May proved fatal to Denison Olmstead, whose numerous contributions to the philosophical and scientific reviews of America, and whose works on the study of physical science will long keep his memory
green. *It also carried off the venerable Alexander Von Humboldt, the patriarch of science, whose mind was a Cosmos in itself. Close upon the death of Humboldt followed that of Dionysius Lardner, to whom the world will not accord the meed of greatness, but it will admit that he rendered good service by popularizing science, and bringing it home to the millions. The month of September saw the last engineering effort of Isambard Brunel, a man of gigantic conceptions and indomitable energy,
who fell a victim to the premature exhaustion of his faculties by intense application to his profession. Hardly had the grave closed over him
when the world was again stunned
by the death of Robert Stephenson,
the illustrious compeer and friend of Brunel, the benevolent patron of art and science, the beloved of the social circle. Lastly the veteran geometer, the profoundest mathematician of Europe, Louis Poinset, has within the last month obeyed the summons of death.

Next to the world of science, that of literature has suffered most. The accomplished historians, Prescott and Hallam, were called away at the very commencement of the year. T. K.
Hervy, the lyric poet, followed in February. In April, the eccentric Sydney Owenson, better known by her married name, Lady Morgan, whose literary career extended over a period of sixty years, and who during that period gave to the world
many brilliant and delightful effusions, rested from her labors. De Tocqueville, who studied our institutions with such earnestness, and gave to the world the result of his investigations in his famous "Democracy in America," (La Democratie en Ameri-que), is the next on the list of the departed. Bishop Doane, of New Jersey, was added to the list in May.— John Angell James and Archdeacon Frause also disappeared from the religious world. Leigh Hunt, the poet and essayist, died in August. The close of the year has witnessed the departure of two of the brightest stars in the literary heavens, viz:— Washington Irving, the patriarch of literature, as Humboldt was of science, the pride of this country, and one of the most perfect masters of our language that has yet appeared,
of whom it is needless to say more on this occasion; and Thomas De Quincey, well known for his masculine and logical style, and for his celebrated "Confessions of an English Opium Eater," his translations of Richter and Lessing, and his contributions to the leading magazines of England and Scotland. Mount Stuart Elphinstone, the elegant and accomplished historian of India, closes the list of the illustrious victims of 1859 in the world of letters.

After science and literature, art has its offerings. Charles Robert Leslie, born in London, of American parents, died in May at the mature age of 65, having contributed by his pencil a vast number of treasures to the galleries of painting.—
Thos. Crawford, our admired sculptor, closed in October, at the early age of 45, in a foreign land, a life of suffering, borne with the calmness and heroism of a Christian. The gifted vocalist, Angiolina Bosio, died suddenly, in April, at St. Petersburg, whereby the musical world sustained great loss, as it has done since in the death of Louis Spohr and Karl Reis-sig, the most learned, though not the most inventive, of modern composers.

The political world has also been deprived of some of its celebrities during the past year. And first and foremost among them was that infamous notoriety Ferdinand II, King of Naples, surnamed "Bomba," whose memory will, for the future, be associated with that of Nero, Ivan the Terrible, and other monsters of like description. The world in general, and Naples in particular, were relieved of his hateful presence in May;
and the same month took away the Baron Von Jellachich, ban of Croatia, so well known for the services he rendered to the Austrian monarchy
during the Hungarian war of 1849.
King Oscar, of Sweden, and Queen Stephanie, of Portugal, are in the royal list. Marshal Lebrun, one of the first Napoleon Generals, the Archduke Charles, his great rival,
Joseph Sturge, the philanthropist,
Rufus Choate, A. V. Brown, J. W.
Davis, Gamahel Bailey, of the National Era, and Senator Broderick, of California, are among the deceased politicians.

The celebrated Austrian diplomatist, Metternich, and his pupil, Count Colerado Mansfield, end our list. The latter filled the highest official situations under the Emperor Francis Joseph, and manifested abilities of a very superior order, though it may be doubted whether men of the genus Talleyrand are benefactors to their race. Politically, though not physically, dead is Frederick William IV of Prussia; his body
lives, though his mind is paralyzed.
We may include him in the catalogue of extinct notabilities, to which may lastly be added Sir Isaac Lyon Gold-smid, one of the great capitalists of London, whose monetary operations have been felt in almost every city of every civilized and uncivilized country.—
With the Rothschilds and Barings
he was associated in every enterprise of magnitude during the last half century, and was indeed a Prince in Israel.

A CONSCIENTIOUS WIDOW.—A poor peasant on his death-bed made his will. He called his wife to him, and told her of its provisions. "I have left," said he, "my horse to my parents; sell it, and hand over to them
the money you receive. I leave to you my dog; take care of him, and he will serve you faithfully." The wife promised to obey, and in due time set out to the neighboring market, with the horse and the dog.—
"How much do you want for your horse?" inquired a farmer. "I cannot sell the horse alone, but you may have both at a reasonable rate. Give me ten pounds for the dog, and five shillings for the horse." The farmer laughed, but as the terms were low, he willingly accepted them.—
Then the worthy woman gave to her husband's parents the five shillings received for the horse, and kept the ten pounds for herself.

"Has that COOKERY-BOOK any pictures?" said Miss C. to a bookseller. "No, miss, none," was the answer. "Why?" exclaimed the young lady, "what is the use of telling us how to make a good dinner,
if they give us no plates?"

Crocodile and Snake Fight.

The following account of an engagement between a boa constrictor and a crocodile, in Java, is given by an eye witness:

It was one morning that I stood by a small lake, fed by one of the rills of the mountains. The water was clear as crystal, and everything could be seen to the very bottom. Stretching its limbs close over this pond, was a gi-gantic tea-tree, and in its thick evergreen leaves, a huge boa constrictor,
in an easy coil, taking his morning
nap. Above him, a powerful ape of the baboon species, a leering race of scamps, always bent on mischief.

Now, the ape from his position saw a crocodile in the water, rising to the top, exactly beneath the coil of the serpent. Quick as thought he jumped upon the snake, which fell with a splash into the jaws of the crocodile. The ape saved himself by clinging to the limbs of the tree,
but a battle commenced in the water. The serpent, grasped in the middle by the crocodile, made the water boil by his curious contortions.
Winding his folds around the body of his antagonist, he disabled his two hinder legs, and by his contractions made the scales and bones of the monster crack.

The water was tinged with blood of both combatants, yet neither felt disposed to yield. They rolled over and over, neither being able to obtain a decided advantage.

All this time the cause of the mischief was in a state of high ecstasy.
He leaped up and down the branches of the tree, uttered a yell, and again frisked about. At the end of ten minutes, silence began to come over the scene; the folds of the serpent began to be relaxed, and, though they were trembling along the back,
the head hung lifeless in the water.

The crocodile was also still, and though only the spine of the back was visible, it was evident that he was dead. The monkey now perched himself on the lower branches
close to the dead bodies, and ambushed himself for ten minutes in making faces at them. This seemed to be adding insult to injury. One of my companions, taking a stone, hurled it at the ape. He was totally unprepared, and as it struck him on the side of the head, he instantly slipped and fell upon the crocodile. A few bounds, however, brought him safe to shore, and taking the tree, he speedily disappeared among the branches.

An exchange gives the following
as the origin of the use of the thistle
as the national emblem of Scotland: When the Danes from England invaded Scotland, they availed themselves of the pitch darkness of night
to attack the Scottish forces unawares.
In approaching the Scottish camp unobserved, and marching barefooted
to prevent their tramp being heard,
one of the Danes trod upon a large prickly thistle, and the sharp cry of pain which he instinctively uttered suddenly apprised the Scots of their danger, who immediately ran to their arms and defeated the foe with great slaughter. The thistle was thence-forward adopted as the national insignia of Scotland.

A bill is before the Minnesota Legislature the object of which is to prevent the immigration and settlement of free negroes in that State.—
Also, resolutions condemning the Harper's Ferry conspirators and their attempt to incite servile insurrection,
and affirming allegiance to the Union and the Constitution.

CATCHING FISH.—They have a curious way of catching fish down on New river. The fisherman lies down on the bank, with his head over the stream, holding a worm in his mouth. The fish, attracted by the spiral workings of the worm to escape, jumps at it. At this moment the dexterity of the fisherman is evinced. He suddenly opens his mouth and catches the fish between his teeth. One old man we saw down there had worn all his teeth off catching fish. Fact.—*Baton Rouge

THE VALLEY TAN.

STEPHEN DEWOLFE, EDITOR.

The New York Times on Mormonism.

We find in the New York Times of Jan. 7th, a lengthy article under the head of "Law in Utah," which discusses with no little ability and vigor the condition of things in this Territory. This article which we copy into our paper, and commend to the perusal of the public, exceeds the severity of any criticisms that have proceeded from us against the Mormons, as much as it exceeds our ability to portray and discuss the condition of things in Utah. If the writer of the article was here, he would, without doubt, have to answer for his temerity in thus venturing to express his opinion upon a matter and concerning a people whose acts and crimes are not to be made the subject of newspaper comment or criticism. The curses of the priesthood would not reach a case as desperate as this article proves that he is. But as the writer is away, he may perhaps escape without curses or threats in case he refuses to retract. For ourselves, we only ask in the language of an acquaintance of ours in town

Is not your very locks at my
And say I did it."

A portion of the Eastern Mail which was left behind the week previous, reached last Monday. The news which it brought was not important. Our dates from Washington, received by Express, are up to Jan. 23d. No Speaker had, up to that time been elected, and the prevailing opinion seemed to be that none could be elected, as long as the Republicans continued to vote for Sherman, his connection and endorsement of Helper's book, the "Impending Crisis in the South," rendering him offensive to all the members except those of the extreme black republican stripe. With the nomination by the republicans of some less objectionable man, it was thought that a Speaker might be elected, and the House organized.

Both Houses of Congress continue to carry on exciting sectional and personal debates, during the pending contest for Speaker of the House. Mr. Seward has returned from his European tour, and taken his seat again in the Senate.

The President has nominated, and the Senate confirmed, the appointment of the Hon. C. J. Faulkner, of Va., as Minister to France, in the place of Mr. Mason, deceased.

"What a fall was there my Countrymen."

"Speaking of cliffs, reminds me of the exceeding cavernous nature of this metropolis. A few nights since, your correspondent, while returning to his quarters, supposed that he was leaping over a 'brief' gully that lay in his pathway, when, to his astonishment, he landed in the top of a tree, whose hospitable branches stood fifty feet from the root, deranging, to some extent, the dry goods that enveloped his person."

We clip the foregoing paragraph from a letter published in the Missouri Republican, and written by a correspondent of that paper from Jefferson City. From the initials of the writer, (K. A.) we conclude that it is from our predecessor, and the founder of the Valley Tan, Kirk Anderson, Esq. This mishap of our predecessor calls forth the deepest sympathy on our part, and we extend to him our heartfelt regret at the derangement done to his "dry goods," in consequence of the accident mentioned; and offer, at the same time, our congratulations, that the injury done did not extend beyond the disfigurement of our friend's cloth to that of his person or good looks. May no accident ever mar the latter!

The weather for several days past, has been delightful; the warm rays of the sun and the mild air which has prevailed, have dissipated the wintry mantle with which the streets of the city and the entire valley have for months past been covered, and instead of these relics of winter, our streets are now nearly submerged beneath the running water produced by the thawing of the ice and snow. The mud also abounds in profusion, and locomotion, in some places, is quite difficult in consequence of its depth and adhesiveness. All, however, are content to endure this inconvenience for a time, in consideration of an early spring of which it is the harbinger. If any are not, we should like to know what they intend to do about it.

Ball on the 22d of February.—There will be a ball at the Townsend House in this city on the evening of the twenty-second of February, the anniversary of Washington's birth day. We are authorized by the committee of gentlemen in charge of the preparations, to extend a general invitation to the officers of the different regiments at Camp Floyd to be present on the occasion.

LATER FROM THE RIO GRANDE.

STARTLING INTELLIGENCE.

Rio Grande City Captured and Pillaged by the Mexican Banditti.

MORE AMERICANS MURDERED.

From the Brownsville Flag of the 19th ult., we extract the following intelligence, the latter portion of which is highly important:

On Wednesday, the 24th inst., our entire regular and ranger force moved up the river in pursuit of Cortinas, who, with his whole guerilla band, it was reported, had left for Rio Grande City. On the day following, Thursday, the 25th, Col. S. A. Lockridge with several friends, started out to overtake our little army and tender their services in any capacity in which they might be needed.

On Monday, the 26th, a courier arrived with dispatches from Gen. Twigg, for Maj. Heintzelman; but finding the Major had left, he started the same evening up the river. He stated that the dispatches were of great importance, and, in addition, said ten companies of the United States troops had been ordered to rendezvous at San Antonio, preparatory to marching for this place. On the morning of that day one of the rangers, John Thorp, from Gonzales, wounded accidentally after the conflict on the 14th, died at the Rangers' Hospital in this place. His wounded arm was twice amputated, but he could not be saved.

On Thursday evening, the 27th, John Graham, Esq., late sheriff of Nueces county, returned from Edinburg, which place our forces left on Sunday, the 25th.

Capt. Ford left about 10 o'clock, A. M., followed by Maj. Heintzelman at noon, Capt. Tobin, with the rear guard, an hour or two later. When Cortinas was at Edinburg, he numbered three hundred and fifty men, as counted by several parties. His force was there divided into three parts: the advance, under his immediate command, was three days ahead of our troops; the second two days, and the rear about twenty hours. It is stated that dispatches reached Edinburg that Cortinas was within ten miles of Rio Grande City on Saturday, the 24th; the merchants of which place, as well as Roma, had passed their goods over the river, preferring Mexican protection to American security. Mr. Graham is of the opinion that Rio Grande City must have been reached and taken by the bandits on Christmas, quite likely followed by the fall of Roma the next day. This, however, is a matter of opinion, yet there are abundant reasons for grave apprehension. The complete demolition of these heavy commercial towns is probable, as not an American rancho near the river has escaped the incendiary torch.

Mr. Graham further states that each night, on the way to Edinburg, scouting parties of the enemy were hovering about the camps, as evidenced by their fires found in the morning. Grass being scarce along the river, and no corn to be had, the horses were weakening rapidly, and the daily marches, as a consequence, were becoming materially shorter.

At Edinburg, Cortinas entered the store of J. N. Trevino & Bro., and helped himself to two or three hundred dollars worth of goods.

On Thursday we heard that Mr. White, thinking the lower country clear, started for his rancho, up the river; but he had not gone more than twelve or fifteen miles, when he was attacked by eight Mexicans, two of whom he reports to have killed. He brought as evidence of what he says, two bullet holes, one in his saddle, the other in his overcoat, besides bloody knife and hands, and one horse. Not having conversed with Mr. White, we know not what credence to place in the tale of his hair-breadth escape and truly marvelous deeds.

In a postscript the Flag adds: Yesterday our worst fears were confirmed, by authentic information from Comago, of the taking of Rio Grande City, on the 24th inst., by Cortinas, at the head of four hundred and twenty-five men.

Every effort possible was made to get up a force to meet him, but without avail, there being at the time but thirty-six armed men, who unanimously decided not to fight twelve times their own number. Whereupon several Americans, with their families, left for the Mexican side of the river.

On the 25th, Cortinas sent a force down to Ringgold Barracks, where they found and killed Mr. Robertson, Mr. Box and Capt. Spears, all of whom are highly esteemed on the Rio Grande for their sterling qualities; besides these, two others, whose names are unknown to us, were also killed.

The robberies on the 25th are said to have been done in a gentlemanly manner, but that toward the evening of that day the soldiers were getting drunk, and it was feared and believed that, not only would the town be completely sacked, but that the American families would be ruthlessly murdered.

Cortinas is reported to have declared his intention to take Roma, thence march directly to Laredo, and effect a crossing of the river.

We commend to the consideration of the Secretary of War, the taking of Rio Grande City, for "prompt action."

LATTER INTELLIGENCE.

Rumor of a Battle and Defeat of Cortinas.

Capt. F. M. White, who has just returned from the Rio Grande, whither he had gone for the purpose of joining the American forces, but arrived after they had left in pursuit of Cortinas, informs us that the people of Brownsville were beginning to feel at ease in regard to the marauders, and that just before he left Brazos intelligence was received that an action had taken place between the troops and "greasers," in which sixty of the latter were killed and nineteen of the former wounded. No further particulars were obtained. Capt. W. states that the health of Brownsville was good, and that the people were apparently on the best of terms with their neighbors of Matamoros, who strongly denounce the conduct of Cortinas.

The Late Expedition against the Pitt River Indians.

The following is an abridgement of a statement published by the Red Bluff Beacon, last week:

During several years last past, extending as far back as 1851, and especially during the last five years, the entire portion of California east of the Sacramento river, and north of Butte creek, has constantly suffered from depredations of marauding Indians, who have been organized in predatory bands, and have been a constant source of injury and dread to the settlers of that country. A minute history of these depredations cannot be given within our limits; suffice it to say that the loss of life and property has been great. It has been a common thing for our citizens to hear that such a man had been waylaid upon the road, and that such a house had been attacked and burned in the night, and its inmates slaughtered—and especially during the last year, the number of whites thus killed has fearfully increased.

See the list of the year—and many more might be named: Mr. Bowles and three men; James Freeman and four men; Mr. McElroy and one man; Mr. Callaghan and two men; William Patrick and one man; Mr. Birney; Mr. McMacken and one man; Peter Lassen, Clapper and two others; two men on Payne's creek—all known citizens of this county. Twenty-five men killed in one year! besides many narrow escapes and other incidents, the particulars of which we have not at hand. In giving these details, we speak from recollection of the facts as they occurred. And the destruction of property has been very great, fields of grain and houses burned, horses and cattle run off, and property of various kinds stolen. We do not exaggerate in saying that the cash value of all losses sustained by Indian depredations in this county alone, since 1856, would exceed $100,000. This may seem like a large estimate, but to our citizens it is known not to be extravagant.

The only through wagon road from the Sacramento valley to Yreka, and over which the most of the northern trade goes, runs through a tract known as the Pitt River Indian country. Teamsters have been compelled to go in company of numbers, to guard their freight and stock; notwithstanding which great loss of life and property occurred. Some three years ago, the California Stage Company stocked the road and ran stages from this place to Yreka. After running a short time, and suffering many losses by stealing of stock, a coach was attacked by Indians while on the downward trip, and the bravery of the driver saved his life and his team. Our readers will remember "Curly Jerry's" ride for life in 1856. This ended the stages on that route.

Last spring, in response to a petition from the inhabitants, Gen. Clark dispatched Capt. Flint with a company of troops to provide for their defence. He was instructed to capture, but not to kill the Indians. This did not suit the petitioners, and they applied to Gov. Weller for a larger authority. He issued to Gen. Kibbe the requisite instructions.

Under these orders, on the 17th of August last, the "Kibbe Rangers" were organized under the personal supervision of Gen. Kibbe, consisting of 80 volunteers, mostly residents and farmers of this county. He found that most of the depredations had been committed by a band of Indian desperadoes, numbering from sixty to eighty warriors, under the direction of a chief called "Shave-head," that they were made up from six or eight different tribes, and roamed from Butte creek on the south, to the head of Pitt river on the north, and from Honey lake and Eagle lake on the east, to the Sacramento river on the west—an extent of country 150 miles long and 100 miles wide; and had communication with and aid from all the tribes within these limits.

While Gen Kibbe was carrying on his operations in the southern part of his field of action, this marauding band of Indians went north, and, in connection with the Hat Creek and Pitt River Indians, killed Callaghan and two men, and robbed their trading post, killed McElroy and Wells, drove off a large quantity of stock, robbed a wagon which was stalled on the main wagon road to Yreka of its load of merchandise, and shot at several persons. After capturing where Indians he could find in the South, Gen. Kibbe and men immediately repaired north, and there, by his assiduity and rapidity of movements, succeeded in capturing a large number, including the chief "Shave-head" and many of his most desperate warriors.

In respect to the desperation of these warriors, we may state that our judgment of their characters, formed from seeing some of them in their native haunts during the progress of the "war," induced us to believe that they might be shot with about as much ease as gray squirrels, and with as little danger to the sportsman. The Beacon continues:

In the south about 300 were captured, without the loss of a single life on either side, and sent to Mendocino Reservation, from whence there is no probability of their ever returning. In the north about 700 were captured, and two hundred killed. Of this number captured, 50 have been sent to Mendocino, and 650 are now encamped at this place, under the guard of the Kibbe Rangers, to be sent to such U. S. Reservation as will receive them; which, it is earnestly hoped, will be so far away that they may never return. The number killed is very small, considering the character of the Indians and the results which have been accomplished, and none were killed except in actual conflict, and where resistance was made.

Arrival of Two Chiriqui Explorers.

Alleged Discovery of a Second California.

Some four months ago the staunch, sharp-pointed, and fleet little schooner, Nashtles, formerly in the United States revenue service, left New York for Chiriqui with William Hance, Charles G. B. Coffin, Dr. Henry Ball, and Samuel Gauthier on board, whose avowed purpose was to delve among the mountains and streams of Chiriqui in search of gold. Two of these gentlemen recently returned with fabulous stories of what they had discovered. The New York Times says:

Four miles along the mountains the explorers prospected for gold. They claim to have hit upon better diggings than were ever found in California but the localities they refuse to specify. In clambering about the mountains they several times narrowly escaped tumbling over precipices. The ascent of Mount Sarah, the highest of the Cordilleras range in that vicinity, came near costing Dr. Ball his life. A rock upon which he was standing suddenly gave way, and he went tumbling two hundred feet down a declivity, before he could catch hold of anything that would support his weight.

Had he fallen a few rods farther he would have reached the edge of a precipice several hundred feet high, beyond which there would not have been any possible salvation for him. The view from the top of Mount Sarah, Mr. Coffin, who has ascended Mount Blanc and stood on the top of Mount Rhigi, declares it to be as fine as the finest Switzerland views. Securing abundant samples of their gold diggings, both dust and quartz, and marking privately the places to be worked in future, the explorers turned their backs upon the auriferous mountains. These samples have been sent to Washington since Messrs. Coffin and Gauthier's return to this city for the inspection of President Buchanan and Secretary Floyd. The section they canvassed they assert has never been explored before. Its distance from Gomez and Raguabai where the huacas are principally located, has precluded the hypothesis that the original gold was excavated so far away.

On their return the explorers took a round about course, for the purpose of seeing more of the country, visiting the huaca diggings, and additional prospecting. They made stops at Caldero, Dolago, David and Beadel Toro. At David they were entertained by the Governor of Chiriqui in generous and handsome style. They met there Mr. Pierson, agent of the Pacific Mail Company, and Mr. Johnson, who cut down the first tree on the Panama road. Mr. Thompson, of the Panama, was also there. Mr. Pierson was once with Kit Carson, and knew John Brown in Kansas. At Beadel Toro they fell in with Mr. Peter Shepard, son of the original Peter Shepard, who received a large grant of land bordering on the upper coast of Costa, from the King of the Mosquito Kingdom. Young, tall and swarthy, like a Creole, he was leading a jolly bachelor existence, attending to his sheep and extended hacienda, the latter in a fine state of cultivation. Intelligent and appreciative, he set before them the best of liquors and segars, and gave them a ride in a canoe, just received as a present from the Mosquito King, who has held the reins of Government over the Mosquito Kingdom since the elder Shepard's death. The canoe was thirty-five feet long, seven feet broad, and hewed out of a solid cedar log.

From the New York Times, Jan. 7.
Law in Utah.

The Secretary of the Interior is in possession of evidence sufficient to convict a Mormon "Saint," named Lee, of having violated and murdered a young girl, a survivor of the party of emigrants massacred at Mountain Meadows, by his fellow-believers, a few months ago. The Mormon authorities refuse to surrender this scoundrel for trial, unless he is to be tried before a Mormon jury. And as no Mormon jury has ever yet convicted any Mormon of any outrage on a Gentile, the offer is simply made to enable him to go scot free. In these circumstances, the Secretary urges the immediate propriety of establishing martial law in the Territory, for the protection of life and property. This is precisely what we have been recommending for a year. To send judges out to hold courts where the laughing-stock of the "Saints," and by which no Mormon criminal was ever finally brought to justice, courts, the process of which was treated with contempt in every part of the Territory outside the camp of the United States Army, was, to say the least, a very grave error. There is nothing more prejudicial to the cause of good order and good government than the exposure of the law and its ministers, for never so short a period, to ridicule. The temporary anarchy of Lynch law does less injury to society than the spectacle of a judge mocked and defied by a rabble. If from the moment the U. S. States troops set foot in Utah, martial law had been maintained, and crime had been punished by drum-head courts-martial; not only would a tide of Gentile immigration have been directed into the valley, but the Mormon mind would have been thoroughly impressed with a vivid sense of the reality of the common law and the acts of Congress. By this time a United States Judge would have been enabled to take his seat in full assurance that he would be respected and obeyed, and we should have had a Christian public growing up in the Territory strong enough to render our further interference in its affairs unnecessary.

The course that has been pursued has, on the contrary, convinced the Mormons of our impotence, rendered the Californian emigrant routes insecure, driven away settlers from the Utah Territory, confirmed the Mormons in their insolence and bigotry, and the Gentile population by permitting the most crimes against them to go unpunished. Common justice, common humanity, and respect for our good name, demand that this state of things should now be put an end to, at whatever cost. We owe it to the Mormons themselves, to the hordes of recruits who are flocking to them every month from all parts of the world, as well as to all citizens of the United States everywhere, to see that there is no portion of our territory in which a peaceful settler may not till his fields and reap his harvests in peace and confidence. We have given the civil law a fair, or rather a grossly unfair, trial in Utah. We have not only tried it long enough, but too long. It has failed to accomplish its objects, which are protection of life and property, and the punishment and prevention of crime. The remedy in such cases—and let us add, the constitutional remedy—is direct martial law. When the courts and police become powerless, it is the duty of every government to try what the army can do to supply their place, and prepare the way for the restoration of legal authority. There has never been a clearer case made out for the proclamation of martial law than the Mormons have made out for us in Utah, and we do most earnestly urge upon the General Government to follow the advice of the Secretary of the Interior, and proclaim it. Put the army in possession of the country. Bring in the insulted judges, the useless sheriffs, the despised marshals. When a murder or robbery is committed, instead of negotiating the terms of a trial with the Mormon hierarchy, as we might with Turkey or Japan, follow the perpetrator with as much force as shall be necessary to take him, and when taken, try him before a board of officers, calmly, deliberately, and fairly, and when convicted, punish him instantly. When a crime has been committed, of which the Mormons in the vicinity are plotting cognizant, and the criminal cannot be found, go back to Norman William's law—lay a fine on the whole district, and collect it at the point of the bayonet.

Such a course as this would be something very unusual in this country, but the whole state of affairs in Utah is very unusual and utterly intolerable. The Mormons are an unprecedented fact in our history, and to persist in dealing out the same measure of government to them as we have been in the habit of affording to peaceable Christian people, is very like offering bay and oats to a tiger. The result of the policy proposed would certainly be one with which the whole nation would be bereft of the trial by jury, and would find the Bill of Rights nullified in their case; but dozens of honest men would have their throats saved from the assassin's knife, and dozens of helpless women would escape rape and massacre. Caravans of peaceable emigrants would travel the high roads and labor on their farms in confidence and security. Moreover, in two or three years, cities would settle in the Valley in sufficiently large numbers to insure their own safety, and when we withdrew our forces at last, we should leave our judges and marshals in the hands of citizens who would see that their persons were held sacred and their authority respected.

The case now presented by the Secretary of the Interior affords a very curious commentary upon the terms in which his colleague, the Secretary at War, alludes to the standing scandal and disgrace upon the American name. Mr. Floyd admits the utter prostration of every safeguard of civil and personal rights in Utah. Nothing could be stronger than his language. He says: "I am satisfied that the preservation of right and justice, through the means of any jurisprudence known or recognized by the people of the United States, is impossible in that territory. It is, in fact, practically, by a system, which is a disregard of the laws or Constitution of the land. The laws of the United States and the will of the hierarchy alone potential there. Beyond a mere outward show of an absence in Federal authority, they are as irresponsible as any foreign nation."

These are words which no American citizen who respects himself or the honor of his country can read without a tingling blush of shame and indignation. They tell us, and they tell the world, that there is a region fixed in the heart of this great Republic, in which the life of every man lie at the mercy of a vulgar and irresponsible iniquity; in which the American flag floats over the open humiliation of American law; in which officers bearing the commission of the United States look on, idle and impotent witnesses, upon the systematic desecration of American homes. And what is the inference? A high functionary of the Government draws from such premises as these? The Secretary goes on, with the most est grace imaginable, to say that his opinion, and because of that, of things—

"There is, in the present attitude of affairs, scarcely any necessity for the presence of troops in Utah, and they are otherwise disposed of in the season. There are no complaints of hostility towards the Mormons. All other Territories are quiet upon our vast frontiers suffering from Indian depredations, but the Moths will play enjoy an immunity from all outrages. For the protection of the people against Indians, there is no necessity for the presence of a single soldier. Murders and robberies of the most atrocious character have been perpetrated in the Territory upon emigrants from the States journeying towards the Pacific and in some of the most shocking instances by white men disguised as Indians. The general impression, so far as the having opportunity to know, as the murders are the work of the Mormon people themselves, sanctioned, if not directed, by the authority of the Mormon Church."

In plain English, that is, the Secretary of War of the United States recommends that the task of coercing the Mormons into decency and civilization be abandoned by the American Government to the wild Indians of the West. He would have us withdraw our troops, and leave the aboriginal savages at full liberty to attempt what we have not the strength to achieve, or solve the problem of Utah. It is a principle of Kilkenny cats. The Mormons, whom we have extended our authority, and whose delegate sits in the Legislative Assembly at Washington, have refused to pay the slightest respect to our laws; they outrage our women and murder our children; they make our national highway unsafe as the sands of the Arabian desert, and therefore we had better turn the Indians loose upon them, surrender the Territory of Utah to these two hordes of barbarians, fold our arms quietly, and await the result.

We doubt whether a more extraordinary application of the doctrine of laissez-faire than this is to be found in the history of civilized nations; and although it is always, of course, to be regretted that two members of one Government should be found arrayed in open contradiction, one with the other, on a question of practical policy, we think the people of the United States will rejoice exceedingly that the secretary of the Interior should have rescued us from the ignominy of acquiescing in such a recommendation, even at the price of imperiling the apparent harmony of Mr. Buchanan's Cabinet.

Southern Literature.

It is but justice to the brotherhood of letters in the United States to say that our literature is not sectional, and that the South has actually furnished a larger share of interesting and important books than the North. We know that this may seem strange to the croakers who are ever harping upon the literary barrenness of the South, yet it is nevertheless true that some not only of the most able, but of the most remunerative books published in the United States have been, and are, by Southern authors. During the past year there has been no biography on either side of the water which surpasses in ability, dignity, and in classic style, the interesting 'Life and Times of James Madison,' by Hon. Wm. C. Rives, of Virginia. Neither in England nor in France, from a number of volumes of field sports in Europe, India and Africa, do we find a more racy, graphic, and interesting book than 'Carolina Sports,' Hon. Wm. Elliott, of South Carolina—just issued by Derby & Jackson. His style is so cheerful, and his English so pure, that it is a positive pleasure to read his sparkling pages.

In the domain of fiction we are informed that of 'Grace Trueman, or Love and Principle,' (published by Sheldon & Co. and written by Mr. Ford, of Kentucky,) more than 30,000 copies have been sold in a few months; and that the 'Hidden Path' and 'Moss Side,' by Marion Harland, of Richmond, Va., and published by Derby & Jackson, have had an aggregate sale of 75,000 copies. 'Ben-Hur,' (Derby & Jackson,) by Augusta J. Evans, of Mobile, has passed through fifteen editions in three months, and the demand is by no means exhausted. 'Mustang Grey' (we believe by Appletons,) written by Hon. Jere. Clemens, of Alabama, has also had an immense sale. Then there is that veteran in the literary world, William Gilmore Sims, who has not only written some of our most popular works of fiction, but has lately enriched his native State with his valuable history of South Carolina (Red-
 Published by the Journal of Commerce.

Published by the Journal of Commerce. In works of Theology, Intellectual Philosophy, &c., &c., the South is behind. Dr. Fuller's 'Sermons' (Sheldon & Co.) are the characteristic and eloquent Christian productions of the former pastor of Beaufort, S. C., who discussed with Dr. Hodge the question of slavery. Fuller's sphere of usefulness was greatly enlarged by his return to Baltimore, and these Sermons are the fruits of his labor there. Professor Hoge, now of this city, but formerly of Richmond, has furnished Sheldon & Co. 'Blind Bartimeous.' And the same house publishes the 'Christian Paradoxes,' by Dr. Crawford, of Mercer University, Georgia; 'Moral Science,' by Dr. Dagg, former President of Mercer University; 'Pictures from an Ancient Artist,' by Prof. H. H. Tucker, of Georgia; and many kindred volumes.

In books for children the 'Oakland Stories,' by George B. Taylor, of Richmond, Va.—just from the press of Sheldon & Co.—is not only having a most extensive sale, but in the Southern and Middle States, but from the extreme North the orders show what is the appreciation of the book there. We were indeed struck with the criticism of the most widely circulated Boston paper, which, though devoted to Republicanism, had the business to assert that the 'Oakland Stories' were far superior to a similar series of a popular Northern writer.

We might multiply examples, but we will state that on inquiring at only two of the New York publishers (Sheldon & Co. and Derby & Jackson,) we find that within a few months they have issued, the one, fifteen different publications, and the other seventeen, all written by Southern authors, representing Louisiana, Alabama, Georgia, South Carolina, Virginia, and Kentucky.

Harper & Bros., Appletons, Dix & Edwards, Scribner—indeed, all our leading publishers—have a goodly list, showing that the constant assertion in certain quarters that the South has no literature is not only unfounded, but that the South actually furnished a large proportion of reading matter for the North.

Execution of Col. Hayne.

Among the distinguished men that fell victims during the war of the American Revolution, was Col. Isaac Hayne, of South Carolina; a man, who, by amiability of character and high sentiments of honor and uprightness, had secured the good will and affection of all who knew him. He had a wife and six children, the oldest a boy of thirteen years. His wife, to whom he was tenderly attached, fell a victim to disease; an event hastened, probably by the inconveniences and sufferings incident to a state of war, in which the whole family largely participated. Col. Hayne himself was taken prisoner by the British forces, and in a short time was executed on the gallows, under circumstances calculated to excite the deepest commiseration. A great number of persons, both English and American, interceded for his life. The ladies of Charleston signed a petition in his behalf; his motherless children were presented on their bended knees as humble suitors for their father; but all in vain.

During the imprisonment of the father the eldest son was permitted to stay with him in prison. Beholding his only surviving parent, for whom he felt the deepest affection, loaded with chains and condemned to die, he was overwhelmed with consternation and sorrow. The wretched father endeavored to console him by reminding him that the unavailing grief of the son tended only to increase his own misery; that we came into this world merely to die, and he could even rejoice that his troubles were so near an end. "Tomorrow," said he, "I set out for immortality. You will accompany me to the place of execution; and when I am dead, take me and bury me by the side of your mother." The youth fell here on his father's neck, crying: "Oh, my father! my father! I will die with you!" Col. Hayne, as he was loaded with irons, could not return the embrace of his son, and merely said to him in reply: "Live, my son—live to honor God by a good life, live to serve your country, live to take care of your brother and little sisters." The next morning Col. Hayne was conducted to the place of execution.

His son accompanied him. Soon as they came in sight of the gallows, the father strengthened himself, and said: "Now, my son, show yourself a man! That tree is the boundary of my life, and my life's sorrows. Beyond that the wicked cease to trouble and the weary are at rest. Don't lay too much at heart our separation; it will be but short. To-day I die; and you, my son, though but young, must shortly follow me." "Yes, father," replied the broken hearted youth, "I shall shortly follow you. For, indeed, I feel that I can't live long." And his melancholy anticipation was fulfilled in a manner more dreadful than is implied in the mere extinction, and then struggling in the halter, he stood like one transfixed and motionless with horror. Till then he had wept incessantly; but soon as he saw that sight, the fountains of his tears were stanch, and he never wept more. He died insane, and in his last moments often called upon his father in terms that brought tears from the hardest heart.

LATEST FROM PIKE'S PEAK.—LEAVENWORTH JAN. 5.—The Pike's Peak Express, which left Denver City December 28th has arrived here, bringing $15,000 in gold dust. Much dissatisfaction existed with regard to the provisional government recently organized, and it was generally regarded as a failure. Attempts to collect the taxes levied by the Legislature were unsuccessful in the mining districts, and a general want of confidence in the adequate power and protection of the government was felt. The people look to a speedy organization of the Territory by Congress as indispensable.

Mining continued on a limited scale during the intervals of warm weather. Building was progressing rapidly in Denver City, but there was a great scarcity of material.

A Home-sick Englishman Cutting his Throat.

A shocking tragedy occurred on Sunday morning at the New England House, 92 Front street. At that place, shortly before 10 o'clock, Mr. Henry Asher, an Englishman, a cigar maker by trade, while laboring under a fit of despondency and home-sickness, cut his throat with a razor, nearly severing his head from his body, and inflicting a dreadful wound, from which he died in about three minutes.

Mr. Asher was a young man, only twenty-five years of age. He had been employed by Neland Loomis, in Suffolk, at his trade of making cigars; but from a feeling of loneliness, home-sickness and despondency, he left his place in Suffolk and came to this city for work. His dejection had induced his brother, Benjamin Asher, to take him for a change of scene to New York for a few days; and they started accordingly on Saturday afternoon, but Henry insisted on stopping in this city over Sunday; so they left the cars at the Asylum street station and went to the New England House, where they stayed over night.

On arriving at the hotel the brothers met an old acquaintance from England, and the conversation had with him produced in the mind of young Asher, a still more despondent and home-sick feeling, and he shed tears while expressing a desire to go back to England to see his mother. The next morning his melancholy again manifested itself by crying and renewed wishes to go home. His brother sang to him some cheery old English songs, and endeavored to cheer him by every means in his power, and seemed partially to succeed. Not long after 9 o'clock he went down stairs, leaving Henry alone in the bed room. Soon after the friend of the brothers from England, Michael Leverett, came to the house to get Henry to take a walk with him. Leverett went up to Henry's room, found him alone, in a very melancholy state of mind, and feeling as if he were alone in the world and every body "down" on him. Leverett soon after left him and went down stairs, where he took a seat. In about two minutes Henry came running down with his throat cut. He threw himself into his (Leverett's) lap, and died in less than a minute. He had stood before a looking glass and cut his neck to the spinal column. He then dropped the razor and came down two flights of stairs. Dr. Elsworth thinks he probably cut but one of the carotid arteries.

Coroner Holmes held an inquest, and the jury returned a verdict of suicide while laboring under temporary insanity. The body was buried yesterday in the Zion's Hill Jewish burial ground. The members of the coroner's jury gave $1 each for defraying the funeral expenses, as the deceased had no money.

The following amusing anecdote is told of John Jacob Astor, in the double character of a patron of literature and parsimonious money-holder, which appears to be exceedingly characteristic.

Among the subscribers to Audubon's magnificent work on ornithology, the price of which was $1,000 per copy, appeared the name of John Jacob Astor. During the progress of the work, the prosecution of which was exceedingly expensive, Mr. Audubon of course called upon several of his subscribers for payments. It so happened that Mr. Astor (probably that he might not be troubled about small matters) was not applied to before the delivery of all the letter-press and plates. Then, however, Audubon asked for his thousand dollars; but he was put off with one excuse or another. "Ah, Mr. Audubon," would the owner of millions observe, "you come at a bad time; money is very scarce; I have nothing in bank; I have invested all my funds." At length, the sixth time, Audubon called upon Astor for his thousand dollars. As he was ushered into his presence he found Wm. B. Astor, the son, conversing with the father. No sooner did the rich man see the man of art, than he began, "Ah, Mr. Audubon, so you have come again after your money. Hard times Mr. Audubon, money very scarce." But just then catching an inquiring look from his son, he changed his tone: "However, Mr. Audubon, I suppose we must let you have some of your money if possible. William he added, calling to his son, "who had walked into an adjoining parlor, 'have we any money at all in the bank?' Yes, father, replied the son, supposing he was asked an earnest question pertinent to what they had been talking about when the ornithologist came in, 'we have $22,000 in the Bank of New York $20,000 in the Merchants', $98,400 in the Mechanics', $83,000—' That'll do, that'll do," exclaimed John Jacob interrupting him. "It seems that William can give you a check for your money."—[Commercial Bulletin.

A bill has been introduced into the Nebraska Legislature, which provides for an election of delegates to a convention for forming a constitution. It provides that the constitution so formed shall be submitted to the popular vote on the 22d of February. On the first Monday in May, if the people adopt it, State officers are to be elected under it.

TOUCHING GLASSES IN DRINKING.—A writer in the Historical Magazine for November, thus attempts to explain the origin of the habit of touching glasses in drinking:

One branch of my ancestry was Scotch, and devoted adherents to Charles Stuart. While a boy, my father possessed a heavy cut-and-thrust basket hilted sword, which one of the Richardson family, my father's paternal ancestor, had used at Culloden. From him this tradition descended to the family as to touching glasses in drinking.

When, after the failure of the expedition of the so-called Pretender, Prince Charles, in 1715, that Prince crossed to France, his supporters were beset with spies on every hand; and it frequently happened that they were placed in situations when they could not with safety refuse to respond to the common toast—"The health of the King." It was understood between the faithful, that when the "King was drunk, it was the King o'er the water," and to express this symbolically, one glass was then passed over another. This, in time, was modified to the silent touching of the glasses. In the lower part of South Carolina and in Virginia, generally settled with cavaliers, the habit has prevailed and spread wherever their descendants have gone in the South and West. It is the habit of men to-day, in drinking, to touch glasses invariably—but never have I known the custom explained by any one else. You may rely upon this being its true exposition.

A CROSS SCHOOLMASTER.—A German magazine recently announced the death of a schoolmaster in Suabia, who for fifty-one years had superintended a large institution with old fashioned severity. From an average, inferred by means of recorded observations, one of the ushers has calculated that, in the course of his exertions, he had given 911,500 canings, 121,000 floggings, 209,000 custodes, 136,000 taps with the ruler, 10,200 boxes on the ear, and 27,700 tasks by heart. It was calculated that he had made 700 boys stand up on peas, 6,000 kneel on the sharp edge of wood, 5,000 wear the fool's cap, and 1,700 hold the rod. How vast (exclaims the journalist) the quantity of human misery inflicted by a single perverse educator!

It is no wonder that abolitionism hates the memory of Daniel Webster. It was he who said: "Now, sir, this prejudice has been produced by the incessant attrition of abolition lecturers, on the common mind. No drum-head in the longest day's march was ever more incessantly beaten than the feelings of the public in certain parts of the north. They have been beaten every month, and every week, and every day, by the din and roll and rub-a-dub of abolition presses and abolition lecturers, and that it is which has created these prejudices." It is for having said this, and for having said on the same memorable occasion that it was time New England had conquered her prejudices against the south, that abolitionism desecrates the memory of Webster, and demands that his statue, which has been erected near the Massachusetts state house, shall be removed.—[Ill. State Register.

THE PIRE'S PEAK MARKET.—At Denver City flour from the States sells at $16 per 100 lbs.; that from New Mexico at one dollar less.—Corn meal is retailed at 12 1/2 cents per lb.; bacon at 25 cents; lard 30 cents per lb.; and milk at 15 cents per quart. Molasses and whisky each $3 per gallon. Corn, shelled, 10c. per lb. in the ear 5c. Sugar 35 cents, and coffee 30 cents per lb. Lumber $50 per M. Nails from 30 to 60 cents per lb.; bread 15 cents per lb.; fresh beef 10 cents per lb., and tallow 50 cents. The cheapest articles in the market are venison and gold dust, the former bringing $1 per quarter, and the latter selling at a drink of whisky per pinch.—[St. Jo. West.

A returned man from Carson Valley reports to the San Andreas Independent that two miners from Walker's river just before crossing the spur of a mountain that forms the southwestern boundary of Carson Valley, discovered a cannon, a small United States howitzer. Its presence in that secluded quarter can only be accounted for upon the presumption that it is the gun mentioned in Lieutenant Fremont's narrative, as having been abandoned by him in that neighborhood, January, 1848, when he was preparing for the passage of the Sierra Nevada.

DISSERTATION ON HOOPS AND DRY GOODS.—She does not believe in wearing hoops:

"Shouldn't I look well? No dear, no. I don't want to pretend to be more than I really am; and, if I haven't been made so unanimous as some, I don't want to cast reflections on heaven for not making me no larger, by rigging on artificial purportions."

She is shocked at the dry goods placards: "Ah!" said Mrs. Partington, as she stood looking at the placards stuck all over the front of a store, advertising damaged goods for sale. It was not a big R, like those which doctors begin their prescriptions with, but the simple ejaculation "ah!" and, as she said it, people going along listed to what she had to say—"This," continued she, running on like a wheelbarrow, "is what is meant by Mr. Jaquets's, where he says, 'sweet are the uses of advertisements.' 'But'—and here she butted against the word "damaged," making two words of it, with a profane construction on the first, that made her hold her hands up in unqualified horror—"but, though the goods are aged, I don't see the need of putting it quite so strong—so much stronger than the goods are, I dare say." Like here pulled her sleeve, at the same time kicking a big dog on the nose who was smelling at her "ridicule," and the old lady moved on amid the crowd.

Fine eyes, curling tresses, coral lips, and regal form, may command admiration, but will never secure love. They may excite a brief burning passion, but will never maintain a truthful and unwavering attachment. There must be the mind to inform, and the heart to inspire the beautiful marble. There must be a light within the beautiful vase—an odor and a soul within the deep-blossoming rose. More, there must be the capacity to love, and to appreciate the love of another; for the most impassioned heart will faint before the shrine of a goddess who never smiles upon her worshipper.

A recently married young man, in Cincinnati, got intoxicated at a wine party, and in that state went home to his wife. As soon as he appeared, she leaped from the sofa, on which she had been reclining, and throwing her alabaster arms about his neck, inquired: "Are you ill, dearest?—What ails you? You do not seem to be yourself." "Well, the fact—fact is that—that—I went to sit—sit up with a si—si—sick brother, belonging to our—our—our lodge, you see, my love, and the li—li—light went out, and giving him brandy, as the doctor had pre—prescribed, I—I must have ma—made a mistake—a mistake in the da—dark, and taken the liquor myself, whi—which I should—should ha—have ha—handed my friend—you see, my dear." This explanation was very satisfactory; especially to the husband.

A few days ago an elderly lady made her appearance at a railroad station to take her first trip by train. Unluckily for her, the train had just moved off as she reached the platform, and as it gathered speed, a loud, warning whistle was given. The old lady instantly set off along the line to catch it, and, on being seized by a couple of porters, indignantly exclaimed: "Let me go! Don't you hear 't whistle' for me?"

WHERE THE SHOE PINCHES.—An old Whig, who now votes the Buchanan ticket, said the other day:

My acquaintances sometimes wonder how I, who have always fought against the Democratic party, can now vote with it; but I can tell them that voting the ticket isn't the greatest difficulty. It is mixing with the men that I find the hardest work.

OPERATIC OPINIONS.—"What a strain that is!" said Mr. Partington, as she heard an aria from Lucia, sung in the highest styles by a young lady where she was visiting. "Yes," was the reply, it is operative. "Up per attic, is it?" said she; "I should think it was high enough to be on the top of the house."

According to a recent report the workmen in the city of Paris number three hundred and sixty thousand. It has hitherto been generally supposed that the majority were those connected with building operations—masons, carpenters, and the like. But it is now estimated that the branch of the business which occupies the greatest number of hands is that of tailors and dealers in ready made clothes—one hundred thousand workmen being engaged in that branch of business.

When the late Gabriel Ralston, of Richmond, Va., had become wealthy, a poor woman, wretchedly clad, with a child in her arms came thro' a storm of sleet and rain, on a cold day in December, to his counting-room, to beg. Among others present, was a sectarian, much prized in his day for his godliness. Mr. Ralston did not wait for the woman to announce her errand, but diving it from her chilled and haggard appearance, stepped to his desk, and handed her a ten dollar note. He was reproved soon as the woman was gone, by the secretarial friend, who asked him if he knew whether the woman was worthy. "Worthy!" exclaimed Mr. Ralston, "worthy? Good God! Sir, did you not see how thinly clad she was, and that she was drenched with the rain?"

EARLY.—The advance guard of the expected immense Pike's Peak emigration arrived in this city, we think, on Friday last, in the person of Capt. John Gregory, the lucky discoverer of the "diggings," bearing his name. We learn that the old veteran is now comfortably domiciled in a tent near the depot, awaiting the first of February, at which time he says he intends to start on his return trip to the mines.—[St. Jo. West.

At the Abolition gathering in Philadelphia last week, an individual of a poetic turn of mind delivered an eulogy on John Brown, in verse, the wind up of which was as follows:

"Green be the turf above thee,
Friend of my early days;
None knew thee but to love thee,
None named thee but to praise."

The poet let his feelings run away with him in the last two lines.

The editor of the Floridian says he received from a lady on the 13th instant "a rich double japonica, a large fragrant rose, a bunch of modest violets and winter pinks, luscious pomegranates, a cluster of grapes, some very fine figs, fully ripe and of the second crop, and a ripe specimen of the Japan plum, with a cluster of the same fruit in full bloom," all raised in the open air.

A decent looking Irishman, stopping at a hotel to warm himself inquired of the landlord, "What was the news?"

The landlord, disposed to run a rig upon Paddy, replied: "They say that the devil is dead!" "An sure," quoth Pat, "that's news indade."

Shortly after, Pat stalks up to the bar, and depositing some coppers, resumed his seat.

The landlord, always ready for a customer, asked him what he would take.

"Nothing at all," said Pat. "Why did you put down this money?" asked his host.

"Och, an' sure, sir," said Pat, "it's the custom in my own country, when a chap like you loses his daddly, to give him a few coppers to help pay for the wake!"

Landlord stood treat all round.

If all funeral sermons were honest and candid, there might be more like this, preached lately by a very "hard" Western clergyman:

"I have been begged, entreated and importuned to preach this 'ere sermon but I don't want to do it. I never did like the man; I never did know any good of him. He had horses and he run 'em; he had coxles and he fit 'em. I have heard he was occasionally good at fires. The bearers will please remove the body and sing the following hymn:

"With rapture we delighted see The cuss removed."

Speaking of churches and "called passions," the Boston Transcript says that a very good thing was got off at a certain church last Sabbath. A lady entered the establishment, and before she would be seated desired to know if they "preached the Gospel of Jesus Christ there according to John Brown?" Of course the sexton was amazed, but the lady remarked that "she had come from Boston and she had heard nothing else, morning, noon, or night for some weeks, and she would like to know beforehand.

Vice President Breckenridge is the grandson of Rev. Samuel Stanhope Smith, one of the most learned and elegant gentlemen and scholars of his day and his great grandfather was the celebrated Dr. Witherspoon, also a president of Princeton college, and one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence from the State of New Jersey.

"Consider Me Smith."

There is a very good story in the papers of the day, of a joke (?) which was played by old Dr. Caldwell, formerly of the University of North Carolina:

The old Dr. was a small man, and lean, but as hard and angular as the most irregular of pine knots.

He looked as if he might be tough, but he did not seem strong. Nevertheless, he was, among the knowing ones, reputed to be as agile as a cat, and in addition, was by no means deficient in knowledge of the "noblesse of self-defence." Besides, he was as cool as a cucumber.

Well, in the freshman class of a certain year, was a burly beef mountaineer of 18 or 19. This genius conceived a great contempt for old Bolus' physical dimensions; and his soul was horrified that one so deficient in muscle should be so potential in his rule.

Poor Jones—that's what we'll call him—had no idea of moral force. At any rate, he was not inclined to knock under, and he controlled despotically by a man that he imagined he could tie and whip. He at length determined to give the gentleman a genteel private thrashing, some night in the College Campus, pretending to mistake him for some fellow student.

Shortly after, on a dark and rainy night, Jones met the Doctor crossing the Campus. Walking up to him abruptly:

"Hello, Smith! you rascal—is that you?"

And with that he struck the old gentleman a blow on the side of the face that had nearly felled him.

Old Bolus said nothing, but squared himself and at it went. Jones' youth, weight and muscle, made him an 'ugly customer'; but after a round or two, the Doctor's science began to tell, and in a short time he had knocked his beefy antagonist down, and was astraddle on his chest, with one hand on his throat, and the other dealing vigorous cuffs on the side of his head.

"Ah! stop! I beg pardon, doctor!—Dr. Caldwell—a mistake—for heaven's sake, doctor!" groaned Jones, who thought he was about to be eaten up. "I really thought it was Smith!"

The Doctor replied with a word and a blow alternately:

"It makes no difference; for all present purposes, consider me Smith!"

And, it is said, old Bolus gave Jones such a pounding, then and there, as probably prevented his ever making another mistake as to personal identity—at least on the College Campus.

A "Dry" Subject.

In a certain accidental city, which shall be nameless, in our story, lives on Jim Swigs, a character, noted for his honesty, integrity and love of whisky.

Not many years since, a gentleman from New England visited that section with a view to invest a few dollars; he bore a letter of introduction to Jim, also a knowledge of the fact, that if he wished to "propitiate" that individual and obtain information in regard to chances to make good "strikes," whiskey was the article to accomplish his purpose.

Armed with a gallon of 'cornjuice,' they started for —, about five miles from town, to look at a 'forty,' which Jim had recommended as a good bargain; hardly had they crossed the river before Jim enquired for the beverage.

"Here it is," said Downeast producing the jug.

Jim took a good, long pull, then, setting down the jug, said—"Pretty fair whisky, that isn't all you've got, is it?"

"All!" exclaimed Downeast, "for heaven's sake, isn't a gallon enough?" "Enough!" and Jim gave him a look signifying both scorn and pity for his ignorance, "why, stranger, what's a gallon among two, with five miles to ride, and back again, with nary grocery on the road?"

The position of the team was reversed instantly; Downeast suddenly remembering something he had forgotten, and back they went to town again.

Downeast never saw that 'forty,' and his funds are now invested in something besides whisky and Western lands.

Talleyrand, when asked by a lady famous for her beauty and supidity, how she should rid herself of some of her troublesome admirers, replied: "You have only to open your mouth, and—"

ATTENTION, STREET INSPECTORS.—We have received the following, which explains itself.

MISTHRE EDITOR: Known' yer redness to meddle in every matter, with good or bad, for diversion, religion or politics, and sometimes in courtin'. I mak bould to ax yer assistance in this quarter of the city, for—blood and tunder!—such a time you never did see. Since the mud sit in divil a bit of theravel has been in Brooklyn street, and Tim Connolly, on the corner, hasn't been able to cross the street to wather his chickens for the last three days, and the coorse of the mud shtrame has damd up at the corner of Ninth street and foormed a sand bar ferainst Jimmy Car's grocery shore, and divil a bit of passin' is there at all, at all. And by the same token, ne and Jim Finigin (divil a bether boy's in town) was passin' that way, and says he to me. "Mike," says he, lookin' to the other side of the street. "A small craft in distress," says I; "let's ferry over," says I. "Come in," says he; "she has struck," says he; "don't you see her co'ors flyin' at half-mast," says he, "and her lower timbers exposed." "Come on," says I. Troth, a sorry time we had crossin', but you know we are not the boys to see a small craft in distress. So we put a shoulder in under the main stay on each side, and raised her out of the mud, and farried to tother side in the terriblest schawl you ever seed. Be jabbers the timbers in the main rigger' knocked every inch of bark from my lower timbers, and I thought I was kilt intirely. And wen we set her down on the other side, tare and ages, did't she scrame murder, and donder and blixen, and called us donder-skin and plackard, and shouted Bolice, and said wat was I goin' to do wid her, and she would call Shon.

"Tim," says I, "let's put her back on tother side."

"Done," says he.

And done it was, but tare and ages did't she give us donder and blixen. "By yer lave," says I, "we left you as good as we found you and so good day to you, and a pleasant walk, and no matter if you wear the biggest end of your timbers downwards, it won't kape all the dirt out of yer shoes."

The last word I heard from her was donder and blixen. Says I, "I'm don't you schmell nothin'?" "I don't know says he." Says I, "Schmell your hands." Says he, "Sour crout, by dad."

Now, Mr. Editor, I want ye's to send up the best pilot ye's have, and see if he can navigate from Broadway to Twelfth street, for divil a mother's son of us can git to Jimmy Car's shore for a drop of whisky. Send the Inspecters up, and ye'll have the blessin' of your ould friend,

MIKE HINIGAN.

DUE NORTH.—An old admiral in his early days went to sea as a midshipman, with poor Capt. Hawser, of the Vesuvius. Hawser was a tremendous fellow for grog; worse even than Old Charley, and that is saying a good deal. Well, when they arrived in the West Indies this indulgence soon brought on a fever, and Hawser nearly lost his life; or as they say at sea, "the number of his mess." The doctor totally inhibited the use of rum or brandy, but told him that when he found himself in a cold climate he might take them moderately; and the farther north he went, the more freely he might indulge. Shortly after they returned to England, the Vesuvius was ordered to the Baltic; and as soon as they sailed for their destination Hawser resumed the grog, so long discontinued. He daily asked to have it increased in strength, as they proceeded on their way, and when they reached the Baltic it was considerably more than half and half. The further he sailed, the stronger it became, until, at last, there was scarcely any water in the composition. The invariable order was given to the steward—"Farther north," which meant "mix it suffer still." One day he sternly commanded him to make it "farther north." "I can't sir," he replied; "you have been due north for three days. It is no longer grog; it is clear rum." "The force of nature could no farther go!"

That was a fearful jest of Norbury's on sentencing to death a thief who had stolen a watch: "You made a grasp at time, my lad, but you clutched eternity."

Four things come not back: the broken word, the sped arrow, the past life and the neglected opportunity.

OLD JAKE'S LAST.—I am clerk in a store in Frederick, Md., and often hearing 'rich jokes,' I thought it might be possible that they would be of some use to you. Here is one of them:

Old Jake S. is a pretty hard drinker, and often when about 'half seas over,' he will tell some of the hardest kind of yarns. Some time ago, sitting in the bar-room of D—'s hotel, and feeling like having some sport at his expense, I told H. to call him in. Just as he was coming in the door I commenced in a loud voice: "Yes, sir, he died standing up; he was taken with the 'blind staggers,' and he got stiff, and died standing up." This was all he wanted. So Old Jake commenced:

"What's that you're talking about—a horse?"

"Yes," I answered. "Humph! that's nothing. When I was a boy my father had a horse that was taken with the lockjaw, and he got so stiff in about thirty seconds that my brother and me had to pry him over with crowbars."

DRINKING VS. SWEARING.—A few years ago Father D—, a large, rotund priest of the church, was stationed for a season in Cattaraugus county. He reformed the pastoral charge confided to him, and finally brought into subjection a herd of wild Milesians, settled in that vicinity, who, prior to Father D's advent, had been a fighting, drinking set, of peculiar hard-headedness. When the Reverend Father was called to another charge, a wealthy citizen arranged a dinner party in honor of the good natured priest, to which his Reverence assented. The jolly priest was unaccustomed to that sort of thing, as the sequel proved. He brought his friend Murphy with him, to the surprise of his host; and sat down to the table with a large party. After eating heartily and observing that the wine was about to be brought upon the table, he leaned over to his host and confidentially whispered—"I larn the custom of this country is plenty of hard drinkin' and plenty of hard swearin'. I can't do the swearin', because ov me profession, so I've brought along me friend Murphy to do it fur me; but I'll do the hard drinkin'." The host smiled inwardly, and told the story after the priest and his friend had gone home as full as ticks.

Night brings out stars, as sorrow show us truths; we can never see the stars till we can see little or narght else—and thus it is with taut.

Longfellow, in his "Hiawatha," thus elucidates upon the tendency of young women to run away with the "fellers":

"Thus it is our daughters leave us, Those we love and those who love us, Just when they have learned to help us, Comes a youth with flaunting feathers; With his flute of reeds a stranger Wanders piping through the village, Beckons to the fairest maiden, And she follows where he leads her, Leaving all things for the stranger!"

Everybody has heard of the famous letters that passed between the adverse chiefs of Sir Connell and Tyrone, the most laconic correspondence in history:

"Pay me my tribute, or if you don't—"

O'DONNELL.

"I owe you no tribute, and if I did—"

O'NEIL.

The following certificate was duly granted to the parties therein named, and signed by an embryo Justice of the Peace, in Peoria county, Illinois: "To all the world greeting, know ye that John Smith and Peggy Myers is hereby certified to go together and do as old folks does, anywhere in coporass precinct and when my commission comes I am to marry 'em good, and date 'em back to kiver accidents."

DYING CONSOLATION.—An old unloved Deacon, in his last hour, was visited by a neighbor, who said: "Well Deacon, I hope you feel resigned in going." "Y-e-s," said the Deacon, "I—I think I—I am resigned."

"Well," said the other, "I thought it might be consoling to you to know that all the neighborhood are resigned also."

"I say, mother," said a regular street loafer the other night, after he had deposited something in a rickety old cupboard, and laid himself down upon the floor:

"I want you to wake me when I get dry."

"How shall I know when you get dry?" asked his mother.

"O, just wake me up any time; I'm always dry."

WHAT HE DIED OF.—The Placer-ville (Cal.) Observer thus accounts for the sudden death of an Indian of the Digger tribe who recently departed for the spirit land:

Perished thus the luckless Digger; Perished, too, from drinking whisky—Strychnine whisky, sharp as lightning, Ruin blue and minnie-rifle, Knock 'em stiff and flaming red-eye—Such as kill 'em at the counter, Forty rods or any distance, Perished thus the wretched Injin, By imbibing strychnine whisky Sold by some confounded bumner At a bit a glass, or cheaper, Strychnine whisky—whisky strychnine.

Rocheboucault has said that hypocrisy is the homage which vice pays to virtue; but even this fine maxim is not universally true. There are instances where, to please a profligate superior, men have affected vices to which they were not inclined, thus making their hypocrisy as homage paid by virtue to vice.

Small acts of kindness, how pleasant and desirable do they make life! Every dark object is made light by them, and every tear of sorrow is brushed away. When the heart is sad and despondency sits at the entrance of the soul, a trifling kindness drives away despair, and makes the path cheerful and pleasant.

There is dew in one flower and not in another, because one opens its cup and takes it in, while the other closes itself and the drop runs off.—God rains goodness and mercy as wide as the dew, and if we lack them, it is because we will not open our hearts to receive them.

Lord Bacon beautifully said: "If a man be gracious to strangers, it shows he is a citizen of the world, and that his heart is no island cut off from the other lands, but a continent that joins them."

Beauty and death makes each other seem purer and lovelier, like snow and moonlight.

Lord Byron once said: "You never know a man's temper until you have been imprisoned on board of a ship with him, or a woman's until you have married her."

Customer to restaurant man—"Boy!" Restaurant man—"Don't call me a boy, sir; I'm no boy, sir." Customer—"Then do as you'd be done by and don't call this mutton lamb any more."

Spare moments are the gold dust of time. Of all the portions of our life, spare moments are the most truthful in good or evil. They are the gaps through which temptation find the easiest access to the soul.

"Our misfortunes," says Sadi, 'should teach us compassion—he best can feel for the condition of the unfortunate who has himself partaken of wretchedness."

There is a man in Algiers who tells such good stories that his friends say it is dangerous to walk with him in the forests, for all the hyenas come round him to laugh.

"I fear you are about sewed up," said a croaking friend to a cheerful invalid.

"O, no, I have only one little stitch in my side."

A country editor perpetrates the following upon the marriage of a Mr. Husband to the lady of his choice:

"This case is the strongest we have known in our life, The husband's a Husband, and so is his wife."

"So I UNDERSTAND, Mr. Tooke, you have all the blackguards in London with you," said O'Brien to him on the hustings at Westminster.—"I am happy to have it, sir, on such good authority."

A Reminiscence.

BY THE JAY.

The pale solemn moon of December
Shines to-night with a pitiful glow,
As it shone on a night I remember,
Exactly six winters ago
It was when my heart was impressive
And to love's tender lessons alive—
(I hope it will not be depressive
If I say I am now twenty-five.)

I went, upon invitation,
With a friend to a so-called ball;
He made a decided sensation,
I made—just nothing at all.
Julia—the Lily
With of raven curls,
I own it was silly—
Her the jewel girls.

Of tender emotion
Up from the heart to the tongue,
I thought with devotion,
Arm so lovingly clung.
I kissed an hour
Of her radiant eyes;
Nite in her power,
Could make her a prize.

And had woven around me
An angelic invisible chain,
In its coils he had bound me,
Foolishly relished the pain—
With a heart overflowing
In love—or some thing divine,
I asked her if she would be mine.

Voiced not—nor screamed—neither Fainted,
Turned quite red in the face,
Tears learned that she painted—
"I said with a dignified grace—
Sound is trouble enough,
Why should I wish for another;
I am a wife and a mother!

A "phoney my phellings" just
I can think of my sudden demise,
—the most foolish of men,
From Julia's eyes;
I might I can but remember,
What a pitiful glow,
I looked down in December
Six winters ago.

From the Londoner Once a Week.

Friend the Doctor.

He Doctor is a negro
—man by education,
—truly nautical—by
—him ashore for

—per, or wither like a —glutted cabbage. Only

—and he lives always under the ——conviction that without his ——able services the captain and
——crew, and passengers to any amount,
——must inevitably perish. Yet my ——friend the doctor possesses no diploma
——no license to practice medicine
——or surgery; no knowledge of physio-——ology; (thanks to his good constitu——) excepting that Epsom salts
——are exceedingly abominable of flavor,
——and up in the course of an hour or ——two to produce spasmodic cramps
——where the doctor would sooner stow
——away a pint or so of pea-soup. And ——my friend the doctor is—the ship's
——cook!

The origin of this appellation it is —hard to discover, nor do I presume
—to peruse of James' Naval History
——any one would be a bit the wiser;
——perhaps it is because he is a general
——defactor. In India they call the ——sea-breeze the doctor, and gasp and ——look out for its approach with all the

——ces at the arrival of some skillful
——cook!

him established on board of some small collier brig, or little trading schooner, whose voyages seldom extend further than the Mediterranean or the Brazils. It is here where his genius and skill are put to the utmost stretch, the culinary means at his command being limited to salt beef
to-day, salt pork to-morrow; pea-pudding, pea soup, lobscouse, and, at dreary intervals, a sea pie. Now and then a hapless shark or a shoal of bonnetas afford him an opportunity of rivaling a soyer in his dishes,
and the liver of a porpoise causes him to be elevated as high as the "sweet little cherub that sits up aloft" in the estimation of captain, mates and crew—so dainty and savory to the poor hungry sailors is the mess he produces. The doctor's mainstay at sea is the dark, dampish pantry, or storeroom, a box about ten feet square beneath the cabin or cuddy,
and to dive into which gloomy recess
he has to furnish himself with a glimmering horn lantern, and remove a hatch just under the cabin dining table. Herein, in casks, in boxes, in bags, piled up and screwed together as only sailors can stow
them, are invaluable treasures, items
without which the doctor would feel like a stranded camel in an African desert. Butter and onions, currants and raisins, treacle and sugar, potatoes, flour, split peas, and curiously intermingled with them, paint kegs, tallow candles, blocks, odds and ends of ropes, a slush bucket, herrings and a bale of salt fish. This region is sacred to the doctor and the second mate. The latter descends once a week to serve out the crew's weekly allowance of groceries—the doctor daily, in search of indispen-sible culinary articles. And what with the horrible stench and the legions of rats scampering in all directions, his visits are usually as brief
as he can possibly contrive to make them. The doctor's only assistant is "Jimmy Ducks," the hapless orphan cabin boy, who is so perpetually occupied with one thing or another,
from lighting the caboose fire at 4 o'clock in the morning to washing out the skipper's socks at 11 p. m., that he can only find time to lave himself once a week, (when the doctor kindly assists in scouring him,) and generally makes the caboose his dormitory for the few hours mercifully allowed him to rest his weary and oftentimes very sore limbs.

My friend the doctor, when he finds himself fairly afloat and out of sight of land, settles down comfortably into every-day life; his sleeping apartment is the best bunk in the "fo'castle," and close under the hatch-way, so as to permit of his enjoying respiration freely. The floor of the fo'castle constitutes his drawing-room, and his large deal box answers for a settee or sofa, or anything that a fertile imagination may convert it into, upon which, of a stormy or rainy night, he will loll, with a very short,
very black pipe in his mouth, and spin yarns to the watch below; till some sudden gust or danger, and the summons of all hands on deck, leaves him to the rats and cockroaches, and solitary cogitations, (the doctor being exempted from sailors' duty, especially at night,) which opportunity he skillfully improves by unlocking and diving into the mysterious recesses of his chest, producing a dark looking, well protected phial, which evidently contains something that comforts him in solitude and danger, and must possess all the virtues of the widow's cruise of oil, that, despite often applications, was perpetually full. By-the-way, amongst other treasures under the doctor's charge, are the spirits and bottled beer on board, besides sundry pickles and sauces, and hermetically sealed meats and vegetables, all which are jealously detained under lock and key in the side-lockers of the captain's state-room, (a miserable band-box, six feet by two,) and brought to light on very remarkable and state occasions.

To investigate the contents of the doctor's chest, would prove an afternoon's entertainment to every soul
on board; for, of a truth, they are varied. From the gay, gilt-buttoned tailed coat, down to the pomatum-pot and the really useful housewife, everything has been bought and carefully packed by the doctor's absent wife, who enjoys the privilege of drawing his half pay, and rents a second pair back in the salubrious neighborhood of Ratcliffe. The doctor consequently looks upon the disturbance of this chest as little short of sacrilege. Every soul on board, from the captain to the cabin boy, entertains a secret veneration for the doctor's "missus," who has been represented by the doating husband

as a paragon of virtue and a "schol-ard" to boot, and who happens to be, at the very time these encomiums are uttered some thousand miles away at sea, enjoying herself prodigiously
with the "double shuffle" at the "Jolly Sailor," and imbibing such liquor comfort as that establishment can provide. But the doctor is happily innocent of disparaging impressions, and though under a dusky hulk, his affectionate heart paints his Susan's portrait as the climax of virtue and goodness.

My friend the doctor's reception room, audience hall, dining and sitting room, are all concentrated in the caboose, which, in stormy weather, is not unfrequently exposed to the risk of being pitched overboard, doctor and all. In it he can never stand upright, in it he can only sit with his knees up to his eyebrows; in it, however, with the door closed to windward, he manages, with the help of a good fire, an iron saucepan, a kettle, and an oven, to prove a perfect magician. If there is one thing more than another in which he excels, it is the manufacturing of that, by sailors,
dearly loved dish—duff or dough-
—without which British tars would go to rack and ruin, and which, being usually as solid and heavy as a leaden bullet, might give a rhinoceros an indigestion, but is satisfying and a mere trifle to the English sailor.—
Here, in this caboose, the doctor receives deputations, who, pannakin in hand suggests that a little hot water would greatly facilitate the weekly operation of eradicating bristles, consistently of a wild boar's nature. Here, when the watch below are indulging in a forenoon siesta, and the watch on deck are up aloft strapping and tarring, and pitching and painting, the doctor receives in state the bare armed, straw hatted second mate, who possesses an appetite awful even for a sailor; and despite the heat of the weather and the fury of the furnace—despite the fact that the perspiration pours down both their faces in torrents, they get up an extemporaneous lunch of thin sliced pork fried with onions, assisted by hard biscuit and washed down
with rum and water that would stu-
pify any other mortals upon the face of the earth, excepting those who are undergoing the fierce ordeal of a hot sun and a hotter furnace, with much manual labor to boot. Here also,
with condescension, the doctor receives the humble appeals of the wretched cabin boy, whose face and arms are covered with slush and soot,
and who, having been suddenly summoned from scraping and greasing
the fore-top gallant mast—a pleasant little occupation which the mate has allotted him, because he neglected to "give them fowls their meat in due time this morning"—has been summarily cuffed and buffeted by the skipper for daring to present himself in his august state room without being au grand parfait as regards toilet.

Even for him the good old doctor has balmy words and a lump of cold duff with treacle; and having been initiated in the science before, strongly recommends the ill-used cabin boy
to return to the innocent and useful calling of clay-pipe making as soon as his poor feet touch British soil again. Hence, also, at stated periods, this great purveyor to the necessities and comforts of the floating community issues the daily rations of coffee, tea, meat, potatoes, pea-pudding, duff, etc.; and seated upon the ledge of the caboose door, with a knife-board across his knees to answer for a table, the doctor condescendingly partakes of every meal,
mingling freely in the conversation and jest of his brother sailors, who are squatted on the deck all around,
receiving their encomiums, and like them, ever and anon cracking a biscuit with his elbow, which has defied
every other applicable force.

The doctor's life on board is rather a monotonous one. His costume is occasionally varied by the state of the weather, and includes a rough tarpaulin coat, in which he invests himself on very rainy or cold wintry days. Otherwise the Guernsey frock, red flannel nightcap, and dubious trousers, originally brown canvas, but now a composition of tar, and smoke, and soot, constitute his daily habiliments. Having no watch to keep at night, he is an early riser;

and a huge bucket of water, soap and a scrubbing brush make his polished skin shine like ebony. Breakfast is no important task upon his abilities,
except perhaps as regards the cabin,
and here it is sometimes a perplexing mental question as to whether salt pork or salt beef fried with a liberal supply of onions, and perhaps seasoned with a little curry powder, would prove most savory for the cabin gourmands.

After breakfast the serious duties of the doctor commence. He has then to visit the harness cask, (as the salt provision casks are called,
and by the way rather suspiciously
savoring, as harness does, of salt horse,) and pick and choose suitable joints for the cabin and forecabin.—
The soaking of this meat, the peeling of potatoes and onions, preparation of duff or pea-pudding, occasionally lending a hand to haul up the bowline, the maintop bowline, Sabbath executions of poultry or pork, interspersed with some score or two of pipes during the forenoon, and friendly admonitions to the poor cabin boy, as he washes up the plates
and dishes—these constitute the every-day life of my excellent friend
the doctor when at sea. The exceptions are high days and holidays,
when potted meat and bottled fruit
are brought into play, and when all the energy and skill of the doctor
are taxed in the construction of savory meat pies, pudding and pastry.
The afternoon and evening, weather permitting, he usually devotes to literature and anecdote, and great is the enthusiasm with which the other sailors receive his oft-repeated story of how in such and such a year, at some small town in the West Indies
—Cook being then a mere hop-o-my-thumb—he and a lot of others contrived to entice and entrap a whole battalion of turkeys and a fleet of geese, by means of skillfully baited fish-hooks; and so, putting manfully to sea, dragged these unwilling victims over the waves and into the ship's caboose, much to the astonishment and terror of the natives, who conceived their poultry laboring under the same influence as the wretched swine of the Gergesenes.

But to see my friend the doctor in the height of his glory and enthusiasm, you must behold him freshly arrived, after a lengthened sea voyage,
at some foreign port, with a score or two of bum-boats flying round the vessel. Who dares interfere with his behests then? From the captain downwards, everybody cofides in his skill and taste, both as regards bargaining and as to the articles of consumption to be purchased. With his ivory teeth gleaming satisfaction out of their ebony frame, my friend the doctor struts the deck barefooted, and still crowned with the greasy red night-cap an object of veneration to the butchers, the bakers, the poultry-ers, the dealers in fruit and vegetables, &c., that are plying alongside.
Strictly he scrutinizes each article—positive is the price he fixes. Gradually the caboose assumes the appearance of a green grocer's, with a poultryer's and a butcher's hard by;
whilst the long-boat has been converted into a fruit-shop. The skipper and half the crew have gone
ashore; the mates and the remainder are busy investigating baskets of oranges, bananas, lemons, &c. By some winked at contrivance, "strong waters" have been smuggled on board, and whilst speculating upon the astounding results that his caboose will produce about dinner time
—the soup, and the boiled fish, and the baked mutton, puddings, pies, tarts, &c.—my friend the doctor
squats down like a black thrush amidst a profusion of foliage; and laboring under the influence of heat,
the black cutty-pipe, and perhaps something else, nods complacently to the gentle rise and fall of the anchored schooner, until savory odors recall him once more to a sense of the arduous duties that a nautical doctor has to perform. F. A. N.

(From the New York Tribune.) Crazy Maggie.

For five or six years a crazy woman, known as Maggie, has been an almost daily applicant at Jefferson Market Police, for warrants to arrest her imaginary prosecutor, whom she designated by the name of Pat Riley. Maggie's case is a very peculiar one, and but very little of her personal history can be ascertained.
She is about 30 years of age, a native of Ireland, has a pleasant, smiling countenance, is plainly dressed,
but always most scrupulously clean and tidy. About six years ago Maggie first made her appearance at Court, where she would take a back seat, and quietly watch the proceedings for a time, and then depart as quietly as she had entered. She was observed to come in this way for several days, always occupying the same seat, and always going away
again without asking to see the Judge, or speaking to the officers of the Court. Her modest behavior and retiring disposition, in such striking contrast with the conduct of the usual female visitors at the Court, finally attracted the attention of the Magistrate, and he entered into conversation with her. She then made a complaint against Pat Riley, a character existing only in her diseased imagination, and charged him with having followed her to church, when he seized her in the midst of the congregation, and violently pulled out three of her teeth.

Thinking to get rid of her, the Justice promised to issue a warrant and have Pat Riley arrested, upon which Maggie, with many thanks departed. In a day or two she came again, and this time patiently waiting till the magistrate was at liberty, she again wanted Pat Riley arrested.— Forgetting all about her previous charge, but clearly remembering the officers of the court—all of whom she saluted with a pleasant smile and a cheery "Good morning!"—she stated that Pat Riley had met her in the street, and forcibly detaining her,
had, in spite of all her screams and resistance, poured a large quantity of vinegar down her throat. Again a warrant was promised, and again she departed, with many thanks, and the same pleasant smile and quiet, dignified air. And so poor Maggie has been coming and going to and from Jefferson Market for all these years, preferring the like frivolous complaints against this superstitious Pat Riley.
Efforts have been made to ascertain
if there really was any such man,
but none can be found. The magistrate learned, however, that Maggie formerly worked as a servant in a respectable family in this city, has no relatives that she knows of, and that she had a few hundred dollars in bank.

That portion of her time which is not spent in court is employed in doing various kinds of work, by which means she earns her living without touching her reserve fund in the bank—on the contrary she continually makes small additions to it. On one occasion, the Judge, thinking to cure her of attending court so much, affected a severity of manner toward her, and scolded her soundly. Poor Maggie seemed almost heart-broken, and left the court room with her eyes full of tears, and did not make her appearance again for some time. Still Pat Riley was ever before her, and constantly afflicting her with his mischievous persecutions; and finally some of these land-sharks known as
"shysters," who hang about the courts,
affected to sympathize with her under the pretense of relieving her from the persecutions of Pat Riley.

This reaching the ears of the Magistrate, he sent for Maggie, and by dint of entreaty and promises of good behavior was again received as her friend and confidant. Maggie then recommended her visits to the court, and still makes her appearance two or three times a week, sitting quietly and reservedly in her corner waiting patiently till the Judge shall have time to hear her complaint. One or two of the attaches of the court are permitted to enjoy her confidence, but to all others she is distant and cold, but always civil, reserving her story for the attention of the Judge.
Her complaints are as singular sometimes as they are frivolous—sometimes Pat Riley has put warts and moles upon her person, or corns upon her feet, or vile and poisonous matter into her mouth; he pinches

her while asleep, tries to put her eyes
out, or to brand letters upon her back,
and a thousand other ridiculous things
does she charge him with and want him arrested for.

Her stories are patiently listened to
and promised immediate attention.
Sometimes she is told that Pat Riley is already in jail, or that he has been sent to State Prison, whereupon Maggie departs perfectly satisfied.
She soon forgets that Pat is in custody, however, and returns for new warrants on new charges, seldom remaining absent more than three days.
Maggie has come to be looked upon as one of the attaches of the court, and is as confidently expected as any one of its officers.

Intensity of the Sun's Heat.

Various opinions or theories have been and still continue to be entertained in order to account for the production of light and heat by the sun:
one appears that the sun is an intensely heated mass, which throws of light and heat like an intensely heated mass of iron; the other, based on the ground that heat is occasioned by the vibration of the etherial fluid occupying all space, supposes that the sun may produce the phenomena of light and heat without waste of its temperature or substance, as a bell may constantly produce the phenomenon of sound.

Whatever may be the true theory,
a series of experiments, made some years since by M. Arago, the distinguished French astronomer, seem to prove that the temperature at the surface of the sun is much more elevated than any artificial heat that can be produced. From other experiments and observations, Arago was led to the belief that the sun is a solid, opaque, non-luminous body, invested with an ocean of flame. The heat of the sun is greatest at noon,
because for the day the sun has reached the highest point in the heavens, and its rays fall more perpendicular than at any other time.
The greatest natural temperature ever authentically recorded was at Bagdad in 1779, when the thermometer (Fahrenheit's) rose to one hundred and twenty degrees in the shade; on the west coast of Africa
the thermometer has been observed as high as one hundred and eight degrees in the shade; and Burkhardt,
in Egypt, and Humboldt, in South America, observed it at one hundred and seventeen degrees in the shade.
The depth to which the influence of the heat of the sun extends into the earth varies from fifty to one hundred feet; never, however, exceeding the latter distance.

It is also a well known fact that the nearer the sun the greater the cold. This phenomenon is explained by the sunbeams bringing to the earth
both light and heat, as they descend to warm the hottest valleys and plains, and passing through the upper strata of the atmosphere, but leaving them always of a temperature much below freezing. This low temperature is proved by the fact that all lofty mountains, even under the equator, are capped with never melting snows; and that the higher the peaks are—though, therefore nearer the sun—the colder they are. Thus aronatus, in their balloon car, if they mounted very high,
would be frozen to death if not protected by very warm clothing.

Another similar fact is, that a glass globe full of cold water, or even a ball of ice, will in the sun's rays, act as a burning lens. In the winter the earth is nearest the sun by about onethirtieth than in summer; but the rays strike the northern hemisphere
more obliquely than the other half year. The whole quantity of heat which the earth receives annually
from the sun has been curiously estimated to be such as would be sufficient to melt a stratum of ice covering our entire globe to the depth of forty-six feet.

roah? Moses.

THE VALLEY TAN.

STEPHEN D. WOLFE, Editor.

Wednesday, Feb. 22, 1860.

In our paper elsewhere will be found an article entitled "Lo! the poor Mormon," which refers to the necessity that exists for Evangelical preaching of some sort in this Territory. The article expresses very exactly the views entertained by us in common, we presume, with every gentle resident in this valley. The gentle residents here, whatever may be said of their probity and integrity as gentlemen and business men, are not all devout and exemplary christians, and do not probably in all instances illustrate by their conduct and lives the precepts and principles of religion. We do not of course mean to intimate that they are outrageously wicked or sinful; far from it. They are about as pious as men generally are, whose entire aims are bent on making money. But something more than this is wanted here as an example to the Mormons of what true piety is. They judge all gentiles by the examples which they see around them, and a great many of them do not doubt form ideas of the christian religion by those that they see here who do not believe in their own absurd faith, but give a mental and general acquiescence to the doctrine of christianity. Now this, no doubt, brings religion itself into some disrepute among them. We hear slurs constantly thrown out from the Mormon pulpit; and from Mormon newspapers here, about christian civilization and refinement. Now what is wanted, and wanted badly here, is a few good preachers who will not only stir up the gentiles a little, but at the same time illustrate by their own lives, the gospel which they preach. We honestly believe that one or two men of talent of the kind referred to, would not only accomplish good here among the gentiles, but at the same time do much towards breaking down the prejudices that exist in the minds of many Mormons here, against the christian religion.

It is a matter of great surprise to many here, that the necessity that exists for the labors of such men, have been overlooked or unattended to by the various churches and religious denominations in our land, and the writer of the article to which we have referred may well inquire, "why the church has so utterly neglected, through so many years, this field of labor which offers such rewards to patient effort." The religious world, in many cases, marches in advance of trade and commerce in its efforts to regenerate and enlighten the condition of those sunk in superstition and ignorance; here they have not even followed in the track of trade and enterprise, but have left Mormon and Gentile, Saint and Sinner to grope their way as they might or could. We venture to say that there is no community in the country in proportion to the numbers that would extend a more generous support to a competent and faithful missionary, than would the gentile residents of this valley.

We need a minister here for a variety of purposes at present. If a gentle here takes a notion to get married, as a friend of ours did a week or two ago, there is no one to perform the ceremony but the Governor; and he is already overburdened with the duties and offices properly belonging to other men. The saints even sympathize with him in the arduous duties, not his own, which he has to perform, and utter dolorous words of grief at the excessive labor that devolves upon him. Certainly it is not right to increase these burdens, by imposing on him the duty of ministering at the altar, the font, or the grave. Let a minister or missionary then be sent on early in the spring to attend to these duties and he will find more than Aaron and Hurr here to sustain his hands and second his labors.

Personal.

We are glad to see again in our midst, Mr. Benjamin D. Spencer, who has been absent some weeks past on a trip to California. Mr. Spencer left here about the first of January, and returned by the last stage or mail from California. His trip extended as far as San Francisco, though he set out to go only to Carson Valley. Whether he mistook his way, or was led beyond the point for which he originally started, by some other cause, we are not informed. Mr. Spencer informs us that he encountered very severe weather on his outward trip, but the cold was much less severe on his return. Business he thought very dull in California. Carson Valley, however, is going ahead. Mr. Spencer spent several days in the vicinity of the mines, and had ample opportunity to ascertain the correctness of the reports concerning them. From what he saw, and from conversations held with many of the miners, he amount of the quartz containing the silver ore is found in one or two localities, and that the owners of these are making almost fabulous amounts of money. But the great mass of the miners are making very little or nothing; and the opinion generally prevails among them, that the quartz does not exist extensively, or in very many localities. A portion of the ore at present found is sent to San Francisco on pack animals, and pays about $3,000 per ton, after paying the expense of transportation at ten cents per lb, the remainder is smelted in a rough manner in the vicinity where it is dug.

Our thanks are due to Mr. G. W. Tracy of Atchison Mo., for the following telegraphic dispatch received at Atchison and forwarded to him here just before the departure of the mail from that point.

If this dispatch is correct the long agony in regard to the election of a speaker in the House of Representatives is over before this, and we may expect to hear by the next mail who has been elected.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 30. Telegraph to Atchison.—From the tenor of yesterday's reports, we have every reason to hope that Congress will organize to-day, and certainly this week. The Black Republicans have dropped Sherman, and the Democrats and South Americans have concentrated on Smith, K. N., of North Carolina. The last ballot previous to dropping Sherman stood, Smith 112; Sherman 106; necessary to a choice 114. The Black Republicans will probably nominate Corwin or Pennington, and both being unexceptionable to a portion of the Democracy, one or the other will, in all probability, be elected.

Nothing definite as yet about the election of a Speaker, but it is thought that one will be elected to-day.

The Leavenworth Herald of Jan. 29th contains the following telegraphic dispatch from Mr. Wm. H. Russell to his son John W. Russell, at Leavenworth city. From this it will be seen that Utah is to be placed in quicker communication with the east and California than she has ever been before.

The distance from Leavenworth city to Sacramento is little if any less than 1800 miles, and to accomplish this trip in ten days on the backs of ponies, will certainly require the riders to "get up and go!"

WASHINGTON, Jan. 27, 1860. To John W. Russell.—Have determined to establish a pony express to Sacramento, California, commencing the 3rd of April. Time 10 days. WILLIAM H. RUSSELL.

The Legislators of Tennessee and Kentucky are on a grand "fare" or tour whichever it is. The last that was heard of them, they had both quit the business of legislation, and the Capitols of their respective States where they were assembled to frame laws, and had strayed off somewhere in Ohio, and were hobnobbing with the inhabitants of the buckeye State at a grand rate. From the toasting and speech making that they are indulging in, no one would think that there was any particular jealousy or hatred existing between these adjoining States. Perhaps, however, the animosity between them is only temporarily allayed by the wine their representatives are indulging in. If so they should by all means keep up the circulation of the ardent and advise their constituents also to follow their example, and quench their bitterness and thirst at the same time by pledging in overflowing glasses, the health and prosperity of their neighbors. The waters of Lethe were said to produce forgetfulness; perhaps the champagne and whisky which the Legislators of Tennessee, Kentucky and Ohio, will drink together, will prove more powerful still and produce both forgiveness and forgetfulness.

Death of Lord Macaulay.

Thomas Babington Macaulay, the eminent historian and essayist, died in London on the 28th of December, of disease of the heart. He was, without doubt, the most eminent literary character of this age, and probably the most splendid English prose writer that ever lived, and his death creates a void in the literary world that cannot soon again be filled. No writer of his day was probably so generally read or so universally admired. His writings extorted praise from scholars and men of letters, at the same time they won the plaudits of the million. A less eminent literary character has said "that the man who was inimitable to the witchery of Macaulay's diction, must be either a Yahoo or a beatified saint."

The greatest and most elaborate work of Macaulay is his history of England, commencing with the reign of Charles I., when Humes' history terminated, and extending with the two volumes which are yet unpublished, but which it is said he left in manuscript, to the termination of Queen Ann's reign. No history that was ever written is probably so full of absorbing interest as this, and its attractiveness is attributable much more to the genius of the historian than to any peculiar or unusual interest in the events or times about which he wrote.

The miscellaneous writings of Macaulay are as unequalled also as his history, and will perpetuate his name as long as the English language endures or is admired. Among these inimitable productions of his pen which appeared first in the Edinburgh Review, it is difficult to say which possesses precedence or superiority; they all seem perfect in kind, and whether extolling the genius and virtues of Milton and Addison, the ambition and triumphs of Chatham and Hastings, or the perfidy and meanness of Barere, his own genius and ability shines equally clear.

UTAH AFFAIRS.

Below the reader will find a letter from Judge Cradlebaugh, of the United States Federal Court of Utah Territory, who is now in Washington, inviting the Hon. Mr. Hooper, the Mormon in full communion, who now represents Utah Territory in the Representatives hall, to a public discussion of different Mormon questions in issue before the people of the United States. Judge Cradlebaugh is a gentleman of fine abilities and great energy of character, and is evidently earnestly bent on informing the public mind of the truth concerning the practices and tendencies of Mormonism, which must be dealt with by Congress, if it would put an end to the enormous expense now growing out of the necessities of our military service in that quarter. If Mr. Hooper accepts Judge C.'s invitation, a vast concourse of intelligent and deeply interested persons will doubtless attend their discussion from its opening to its close.

WASHINGTON, 18th Jan., 1860. Wm. H. HOOPER, Territorial Delegate from Utah.

Sir:—I see from time to time the N. Y. Herald's correspondence from Utah, in which denials are made of the charges preferred against the people you represent, and false suggestions expressed as to the condition of affairs in that Territory.

Now to the end that the country may know the truth respecting these matters, I have thought it right and necessary to address you this communication. I assert—

1st. That the Mormon people are subject to a theocratic government, and recognize no law as binding which does not coincide with their pretended revelations as promulgated by their "Prophet, Seer and Revelator," Brigham Young.

2d. They have taught, and still teach Treason against the government of the United States.

3d. That they practice polygamy in a manner shocking to the moral sense of the world, and aggravate the offence by incest and murder.

4th. That they teach the doctrine of "the shedding of human blood for the remission of sin," as defined by their own ecclesiastical code, and these teachings are carried into practice. The murders of Jones and his mother at Poudre; of the Farrisies and Potter at Springville; of the Aiken party at Chickadee Creek, the mud fort at Salt Creek, and at the bone yard, and of Forbes at Springville, are the natural results of these vile doctrines.

5th. That they teach the doctrine that it is right and godly that Mormons should rob Gentiles whenever they can do so with facility and escape public exposure. The Mountain Meadows Massacre is a melancholy proof of this fact.

6th. That they teach the doctrine and practice it, of castrating men, and have declared from their pulpit, with public acquiescence, that the day was near when their valleys would resound with the voice of Eunuchs.

I am prepared here and now with proofs to sustain these charges, unpremeditatedly taken from numberless enormities; and occupying the position which you do here—a member of the Mormon church, having received your endowments and taken upon yourself the oaths and obligations of the church—I have to say to you that I will at any reasonable time and place of your own selection, meet you face to face before the people and Federal authorities here, ready, but sorrowfully, to substantiate every specification herein contained.

I have a file of the Deseret News, your church organ, running from 1850 to 1859, containing Mormon history of current affairs during that period; and should you accept this proposition for calm, fair comparison of testimony on these subjects before a discerning public, this file will be at your call for reference.

Respectfully,

JOHN CRADLEBAUGH.

The above statement and letter of Judge Cradlebaugh to Mr. Hooper, delegate in Congress from this Territory, is taken from one of the Washington City papers. The paper from which it is copied does not state whether Mr. Hooper would accept or decline the proposition for discussion tendered him by Judge Cradlebaugh, but from a private letter received by a gentleman in this city from Washington, we are informed that Mr. H. will not, and dare not accept the challenge of Judge Cradlebaugh, and that his declining to do so will be regarded in Washington and elsewhere as evidence that he cannot disprove the charges made in the letter of the Judge. It has been rumored, but on what authority we know not, that Mr. Hooper denies in Washington that he is a Mormon or connected with the Mormon church. Whether he does or not we do not know; one thing is certain, whether he represents the religious tenets of the Mormons or not, as their political representative and delegate, it would certainly appear to be his duty to vindicate his constituents from such charges as the Judge has made against them, if he felt able to do so. Mormon newspapers and leaders are in the constant habit of evading the charges so frequently made against them by attributing them to slander, and the statement of hired and irresponsible letter writers. But here the charges come in no obscure form, and from no obscure and irresponsible source; they are clearly and specifically set forth; the man who makes them occupies a position of responsibility and honor, that entitles his statements to some weight and consideration, if not disproved or denied. He assumes the burden of establishing the charges that he has made against the Mormon church and people, if their delegate in Congress will only meet him in public discussion concerning those charges; and if this is declined, the Mormons cannot thereafter, as they have heretofore, skulk down behind the plea that irresponsible persons have lied about them; nor can they else where, as they have attempted to do here, stifle the freedom of speech by bravado or threats of violence.

[For the Valley Tan.]

Mr. Editor:—I have noticed some disposition on the part of the Mormon papers in this city, to find fault and abuse the present mail contractors. It may not be generally known that the amount of mail matter now brought to this city, is at least 70 per cent. greater than it has been at any time previous. This, in connection with the fact of the mail being brought in on time throughout the whole winter, should at least entitle the contractors to the respect of this community, who are reaping the benefits of a mail route established expressly for the use of the army and the citizens of the United States now in Utah, at an enormous expense. The present wealthy contractors have been doing business for the Government for many years, and there is, perhaps, no company in the west who retain the confidence of the mail and war departments to the same extent. They have been anxious to serve the public in this service, and when the service was reduced to a semi-monthly, they offered to carry it weekly for the same price; and it is, no doubt, owing entirely to the influence and knowledge of one of the contractors, that we are now indebted for a weekly service during the coming season, and also an express that will place us within 4 or 5 days communication with the Atlantic and Pacific. These remarks are very much out of place, coming from the source they do, and show plainly that they come from a spirit still chafing under the smart of disappointment, and want of confidence in the department, who will not trust the mail to Mormon contractors. This, however, is natural, and we advise our friends to be patient; there is a good time coming. The Lord will lead his people out of this difficulty, as he has out of many others, that is to say, he would do so, if his confidence in them was any greater than the heads of the Post Office department.

ONE WHO IS INTERESTED.

THE JAPANESE EMBASSY TO THE UNITED STATES.—The embassy was to be ready to sail in the Powhatan, on the 22d of February proximo. The Shanghai Herald says of them:

"The new Commissioners have been appointed of noble rank, one of the two last appointed, a year ago, having been the Governor of Kanagawa at the time of the outrage upon the Russian party, when an officer and seaman were attacked and murdered one evening in the street of Yokohama by a party of Japanese, who have not been detected. The Governor was degraded from his office on this account, since if he was not implicated in the affair, of which there is no evidence, he was charged with inefficiency in not bringing the guilty to justice. Under these circumstances Mr. Harris would have objected to his being one of the Commissioners, had his appointment not been revoked. The mission, as now arranged, will consist of two Commissioners, two Censors, or spies upon the conduct of the Commissioners and others, three Lieutenant-Governors, eight Generals and Colonels, two Interpreters, two Physicians and forty servants. It is hoped the number of the latter may be considerably reduced, as the accommodations of the ship are hardly equal to such a demand upon its hospitality. The Japanese dignitaries, however, seem to think there is no honor without a retinue, and when assured that a train of servants would rather be annoying in the United States to the Commissioners than advantageous, either on the score of comfort or honor, they could hardly comprehend it. Still more amused were they, when they were assured that the President of the United States used his own feet when he went out in the streets of Washington, and walked about as he pleased without a single attendant. They must be continually startled when they reach a country whose institutions are entirely, like itself, completely at the antipodes of its own."

Gerrit Smith has so nearly been restored to complete health that he has returned to his home at Peterboro'.

THE LATEST NEWS.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 27. HOUSE.

Mr. Adrian caused to be read a paragraph from the New York Tribune, in which it was said that Messrs. Horace F. Clark, Riggs, Adrian, Briggs and Davis of Indiana, were elected with the aid of Republican votes, with the understanding that they would assist the Republicans in the organization of the House. He said that he would not engage in a political controversy with an editor. He had great respect for Mr. Greeley and considered that he had been misinformed by some evil-disposed party. There was not a particle of truth in the Tribune's statement. He had made no such pledge and was under no such obligations as were implied in that statement; but, nevertheless, he could imagine a contingency when the interests of the country and his own sense of duty might compel him to unite with the Republicans in effecting an organization.

Messrs. Davis of Indiana, and Riggs, also denied the truth of the Tribune's allegation.

On motion of Mr. Maynard the House proceeded to vote for Speaker amid much excitement. The South Americans voted for Smith of North Carolina. Various Democrats now seeing there was a prospect of an election changed their votes to him. Some made brief explanations to the effect that they wanted to promote harmony in the contest. There was frequent applause, and marked attention was paid on all sides. Messrs. Morris of Pennsylvania, Milward, Dixon, Scranton and Wood, who had voted heretofore for Sherman now voted for Smith. Before the result was announced there was a change in the current of feeling.

John Cochrane rose to give his reasons why he could not vote for Smith.

Several gentlemen endeavored to deprive him of the floor, by raising points of order on him.

In conclusion, Mr. Cochrane changed his vote to Mr. Milson. He could vote for none but a Democrat.

Other explanations were made by Democrats, for a change of their votes to Mr. Smith.

Mr. McClernand said as it was now in the power of the Democratic party proper to elect Smith, he changed his vote for him, and expressed his hope that the Democrats of the North-west would give him their support.

Mr. Boock made a short speech. He was always willing to unite on any sound man, and voted for him.

Other Democratic changes were made to Smith, accompanied by occasional remarks, some saying they desired to give peace to the country and strike a blow at this irrepressible conflict, preferring a National Whig to a sectional Republican.

Mr. Morris, of Ill., said if his vote could elect Smith, he would not give it.

Other explanations were favorable to changing for Smith.

Intense interest was expressed throughout the proceedings.

More short speeches were made.

Mr. Cobb made a humorous speech by way of exhortation to his dissenting political friends to come to the support of Smith. He called attention to the fact that men of all parties voted for him. If gentlemen did not avail themselves of the present opportunity, they never would come as near electing a nominee opposed to the Republicans.

Mr. Ruffin, as the only man standing aloof from the Southern phalanx, voted, after an explanation, for Smith, saying he had been encouraged by his Northern Democratic colleagues to do so.

Other explanations followed. Messrs. English and Niblack voted for Smith as the contest was narrowed down between a Republican and an American.

Mr. Morris of Ill., wanted Mr. Smith to say for himself whether he repudiated the doctrines of the Know Nothings. Several Democrats stated that they had heard this fact from his own lips.

Mr. Burnett thought they ought to let patriotism be above party. At this crisis Mr. Morris wanted Mr. Smith to answer the question.

Mr. Clemens and others objected to Mr. Smith's responding.

Mr. Smith wanted a man to go into the chair untrammelled as a fair and honest man. Other votes were changed for Smith and greeted with applause.

Mr. Morris of Ill., finally came over to Smith, being satisfied that he was not a Know Nothing. Tremendous applause followed. Several other Democrats changed to Smith, among them John Cochrane, who had learned that Mr. Smith never was a member of a Know Nothing lodge, but that he was an old line whig and a representative of national principles. Applause followed. The interest increased as the House neared an election.

Mr. Barr changed his vote to Smith.

Mr. Sherman voted for Corwin, when Mr. Judkins changed from Smith to Sherman, thus spoiling for the time an election.

Mr. Scranton withdrew his vote for Smith and put Corwin in nomination.

Cries of two late. Much sensation.

Messrs. Vallandigham and Cox changed to Smith.

Two more votes were now understood to be required to elect Smith. Intense interest was manifested.

Mr. Morris of Pa., understanding that the Republicans would present Mr. Corwin, withdrew his name from Smith and voted for Corwin.

Hisses from the galleries and cries of announce the vote.

Mr. Nixon changed from Smith to Pennington, thus removing the result further off.

Mr. Keitt commenced making a speech. Mr. Dunn thought Mr. Keitt's remarks were designed to delay, in order to afford an opportunity to manipulate tender-footed Democrats.

Mr. Keitt proceeded to express the inconsistency of those who voted for and then changed against Mr. Smith.

The result was finally announced.—Whole number of votes, 228; necessary to a choice, 115. Sherman, 106; Smith of N. C., 112; Corwin, 4; scattering 6.

Mr. Stephens moved that the House adjourn till Monday.

Carried by six majority. Adjourned.

FROM WASHINGTON.

WASHINGTON, January 26. Thaddeus Hyatt, President of the National Kansas Aid Committee, will, on the 1st February, appear before the committee in relation to the disposition of the funds received by the Tribune for the relief of Kansas, in the fall of 1856. It is now reported that the prominent letter from Senator Wilson cannot be found, but the testimony of Rea Wilson himself, as to its contents, is probably taken as sufficient.

Dr. Howe, to whom the letter was written, has not been subpoenaed to appear. He is not in Canada, and said he will have no hesitation to appear to testify, if wanted.

Mr. Giddings has never refused to come here. He has been absent from home on a lecturing tour, and the subject sent to Ohio for him did not reach him, but notice of the fact has reached him from another State, and he is daily expected here. Old Brown's son, John, Jr., does not consent to come here, nor Samuel of Massachusetts, either.

Letcher, Superintendent of the El Paso and Fort Yuma Wagon Road, for the construction of which an appropriation was made in 1856, has been indicted by the Grand Jury of this District on charges of fraud, forgery, &c.

An avalanche of witnesses from Washington have been precipitated upon the case, to testify in this case, but they say they have no knowledge of what they are expected to testify to.

FROM TEXAS.

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 26. On Sunday last Cortinas, with men, was above Matamoros, and the Texans. The Federal troops had turned to Brownsville, and the Rangers were at Rio Grande City. The opinion was that a frontier war with Mexico is inevitable.

A bill requiring the removal of Negroes from the state of Mississippi in a specified time, has passed a territorial branch of the Legislature, and it is confidently believed soon pass the House, and then a law.

Lo! the poor Mormon! been suggested to us much need of Evangelizing in Utah Territory. We formed that there never has been a sermon of the true Gentle spirit proclaimed in that benighted land. The Gentiles have no apostle in Utah. If a man is not a Mormon he is left to live and die without benefit of clergy.

We are assured that this is the most potent reason of the lute supremacy of the Mormon over the people of that Territory. To be cut off from the Church is to be an utter outcast as all religious privileges are concerned. This is a most come and even terrible thought to those who have taken up their abode in that isolated land.

Why is it that the church has utterly neglected, through so many years, this field of labor which such rewards to patient effort. The heathen of foreign lands has been overlooked. Prisons, tortures, chains and death have been daily every crime by the so-called Christians, and will Utah, our continent, people, color and country grope in ignorance and darkness. We are a men who have special valley that there is no known or attempted cause more perhaps else has contributed to sway of the detestable creed. We hope that more religious duty, and patriotism as well at once induce the proper remedy for this evil.

THE CONGRESSIONAL INVESTIGATION INTO THE HARPER'S FERRY INVASION.—The investigation of the Harper's Ferry raid, ordered by the United States Senate, is now being forwarded, and every person mentioned by Brown and his associates will be brought up for examination. On Saturday last, notwithstanding the denial of a city paper, because it did not get the news, or what is perhaps equally probable, because it did not wish it to be true, having a special interest in the matter, Mr. Atchison of Kansas, was summoned, with others, before the investigation committee, and more, including Hon. Greeley, will be subpoenaed in due time. This is as it ought to be, we trust that the committee will follow up the action of the Senate with promptitude and vigor, and leave no stone unturned. John Brown has no money of his own, and the arm expedition against Virginia must have cost about thirty thousand dollars. Where did all this money come from? That is the business of the committee to find out; and we have no doubt that some of the contributors are ready shaking in their shoes at the prospect of having their complicity brought to light in such a way may endanger their necks. York Herald.

ACCIDENT AT THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.—The bridge over the Waiala river, at Hilo, gave way on the 21st of October, just as a number of Americans were crossing on horseback. The party had been on a picnic excursion, and were returning to town in the latter part of the afternoon. It consisted of the Hon. S. L. Austin and Mrs. Austin, three sons and a daughter of Rev. D. B. Lyman, R. H. Dana, Jr., Esq., of Boston, Capt. Henry Burdett of the Boston ship Raddaga, with Mrs. Burdett, Capt. Brown, Mrs. Guilch (sister of Mrs. Austin), Miss Pratt (sister of Mrs. Charles Brewer), Mrs. Hines, Mrs. Ashley, Capt. Blackner, and J. H. Coney, Esq., sheriff of Hilo.

As a portion of the party were crossing the bridge, the report of the snapping of a chain was heard, then a crash, and the bridge tipped, broke and fell. The bridge was from fourteen to eighteen feet above the water. There was immediately a scene in the water of struggling men, women, and horses. Mrs. Austin was pulled out of the water, but her horse was drowned. Capt. Burdett held on to the rail of the bridge with one arm, which kept him from going down. Mrs. Burdett was for a time in extreme peril, but was rescued. Mr. Dana was in the middle of the bridge when it broke, and went into the water with his horse, keeping his head above water, but both becoming involved in the wreck of the bridge.

Mr. Dana got a blow on the foot, fractured a bone and bruised his head. Mrs. Burdett was for a time in extreme peril, but was rescued. W. H. SEWARD'S TESTIMONY CONCERNING AFRICA.—In the extracts from some letters of W. H. Seward, published in the Albany Journal, giving his observations as a traveler abroad, we perceive that he claims, on leaving Egypt for the Holy Land:—"Farewell, Egypt! long I have seen at last. Farewell, Africa! the only region in the world which Providence seems to have fortified against civilization." And why fortified? Is it on account of the African soil or climate, or the African race? The subject is an interesting one, and we hope that Mr. Seward, on his return home, will avail himself of the first occasion to explain why he thinks Africa the only region in the world which Providence seems to have fortified against civilization."—*N. SUPERIOR COPPER.—A late issue of the Lake Superior Miner, says of copper of a half a whole ton weight, would attract more attention here (unless as an indication of something of a location), than would a ferret hog in the streets of Cincinnati. There have been a thousand tons of copper at once upon our docks, in the Spring of the year, and of this, probably two-thirds was in masses heavier than a ton in weight and many of these were but pieces of an immense mass, the weights of which were counted by hundreds of tons.

And again, to give an idea of the immense masses of pure copper taken from these mines, we will give some of the features of the great mass taken from the Minnesota mine some two years ago. Its greatest length was 45 feet—greatest breadth, 18 feet, and greatest thickness more than 6 feet. It required about fourteen months to cut it into pieces small enough to be taken from the mine, and weighed about 400 tons. The chips of copper made in the process of cutting it up, weighed about 17 tons. The value of the metal from the great mass, at the price of copper at that time, was about $180,000.

"Have you," said a young lady, entering a music store in which we were standing, leaning over the counter, and addressing the young man. "Have you 'A Heart that loves me only'?" "Yes, Miss," was the reply; "and here is 'A Heart to thee Mary.'" Mary took the songs, and was leaving the store, when suddenly she returned. "I forgot! I want 'One sweet Kiss before we part.'" We left, and can't say whether she obtained it or not.

A VISIT TO MRS. POLK.—A correspondent of the Concord (N. H.) Patriot, writing from Nashville, Oct. 8, thus handsomely alludes to Mrs. President Polk:—"With Major Eastman, of the Nashville Union and American, I called upon Mrs. Polk, who occupied the splendid mansion in Nashville, built by Hon. Felix Grundy, and purchased by President Polk of Judge Grundy's heirs, to which he retired after leaving the White House, and where, worn out by the cares and anxieties of office, he died some four months after the expiration of his official term. The mansion, surrounded as it is by beautiful grounds, is one of the pleasantest residences in the city, and no one who has had the pleasure of meeting Mrs. Polk needs the assurance that it is presided over with an affability and dignity that make it a center of attraction."

"Mrs. Polk is probably the most generally known of any woman in America, and is universally conceded to be the most amiable, accomplished and intelligent woman of her time. She possesses that graceful ease of manner, tact and readiness in conversation, which makes every one feel at home in her society, and renders her conversation so charming."

She contested the palm of popularity evenly with Mrs. Madison, and with that single exception, was much the most popular lady that ever held the honors at the White House; while here in Nashville she is regarded with a love and admiration that approach to reverence. Regularly, on the first of January, the Legislature of Tennessee adjourns by formal vote to permit members to pay their respects to Mrs. Polk—an honor never accorded to any other person, not even Gen. Jackson himself—and, with the Speakers of both Houses at their head, proceed in a body to her house. Their action affords a fair instance of the respect and esteem in which she is held."

LATEST FROM PIKE'S PEAK.—Leavenworth Jan. 27.—The Pike's Peak Express arrived here to-day, having been delayed one day by severe snow storms. It brings $4,000 in gold and five passengers.

The news from the gold region is scanty. A new movement had taken place towards the mountain, in consequence of the opening of several new diggings.

The miners in the South Park, and on the Blue were reported to be making from ten to thirty dollars per day.

It was feared that a renewal of inclement weather might cause much suffering in the mining districts.

The snow had nearly disappeared.

The prospects of the Great Eastern are said to be looking much brighter. The report of the arbitrators between Mr. Scott Russell, the builder, and the owners, will put down various flying rumors discreditable to the builder and to the vessel, and exonerate Mr. Russell from the imputation of using inferior materials, and executing his work not in accordance with his contract. There is now a very direct prospect of the vessel being chartered by Mr. Lever, on terms very favorable to the shareholders and all interested. The correspondence between the parties on the subject, and the offer he has made, is published. If accepted, he will have the ship finished at once, in good style, put into a regular trade, and guarantee a good dividend to the shareholders on their stock of £330,000.

The largest emporium for furs in the world is doubtless Moscow; and apropos of this last named city, we recently learned from one who was present at the first World's Fair in London, 1851, where the furs from Moscow for the exhibition were being unrolled, he observed that each fur contained a swan's quill one end of which was lightly corked. On equipping of a Russian gentleman who had the fur in charge, he was informed that the quills contained liquid silver, and were a certain preventative of the attacks of moths. Next to Moscow as a fur emporium comes St. Petersburg, then London, Leipsic, etc. In this country New York is the great fur mart, and Maiden Lane the street where furriers most do congregate.

IRON WORKS IN THE U. STATES.—There are 1,555 iron works in the United States—882 furnaces; 488 forges, and 225 rolling mills, which produce annually about 850,000 tons of iron, worth in ordinary years $50,000,000. Mississippi, Louisiana, Florida, Texas, Iowa, Minnesota, California and Oregon only have no iron works.

Love's Young Dream—Now-a-days.

Oh! tell me of that distant sea
Roll wide between me and my lover,
For he, I'm sure, is at his ease—
And I'm in clover.

And don't tell me that foreign parts
Will ever make me, dear forget him;
Nor will he take to breaking hearts,
Unless I let him.

He writes to me by every post,
And every post takes back my answer;
He writes of 'muffins,' sleighs and frost—
I of my dancer.

So don't tell me that I must mope,
While he's in Canada recruiting;
He's neither Bishop, Saint, nor Pope,
And fond of shooting.

I wish you'd write to him some day,
How very badly I'm behaving;
He'd send back word at once to say
He thought you raving.

He likes my going to a ball,
And talking German with Lord Rowan;
D'you think that, out at Montreal,
He flirts with no one?

Ah! you don't know him. I must own
I've seen you flirt, my pretty cousin,
But Willy soon would flirt you down,
And send a dozen.

Don't talk such sentimental stuff—
You preach as if I were a baby;
As Willy says, 'I'm not a muff,
Nor he, a gaby.'

I know he's very fond of me—
I know I'm very fond of Willy;
And as to doubts and jealousy,
We're not so silly.

We both intend to have our fun,
And then to marry one another;
And, as the music is begun,
Pray, no more bother.

[Blackwood. H. D. W.]

A Justly Merited Rebuke.

The following account of the humiliation of a purse proud merchant by one of his abused clerks, we take from the U. S. Police Gazette:

"Oh, but, man, proud man!
Dressed in a little brief authority,
Most ignorant of what he's most assured,
His glassy essence, like an angry ape,
Plays such fantastic tricks before high heaven,
As makes the angels weep."

A HEARTLESS MONOPOLIST.—A. T. Stewart is king among dry goods men. He has his marble palace, and has killed off most of the little houses in his line, and made their proprietors his clerks. He looks upon humanity with about as much feeling as upon his stale stock, and as soon as his holiday trade began to slacken, sacked some fifty of his clerks and other employees, without warning or hesitation. "Whistling them down the wind to prey on fortune," or starve. Many of those summarily discharged have served him faithfully for many years, and one among the number, who had been in Mr. Stewart's employ about six or seven years, doing his duty in the most exceptional manner, ventured to remonstrate against the peremptory dismissal of himself and fellow clerks, and begged that Mr. S. would at least furnish him in return for his prolonged service and fidelity, with a recommendation to enable him to procure another situation. Mr. Stewart refused, and told the applicant he could not be bothered. The clerk persisted. The bloated millionaire turned upon him in wrath, and bade him go about his business, as his time was too precious to be wasted upon such "loafers" as he.

The salesman, who possessed the feelings and spirit of a gentleman, demanded to know if that insulting epithet was applied to him; and on receiving a reply in the affirmative, as the boy says, "drew off and let him have it," and with one blow brought the colossal monopolist to the floor, minus two of his front teeth. The head of the marble house thought he was struck by a thunderbolt, for it seemed incredible that a mere mortal, and a clerk at that, could dare to prostrate so great a man. Upon assuming himself, however, of the audacious fact, he had his assailant arrested and taken to the police Court; but reflecting, how small and contemptible he would appear in such a case, Mr. Stewart thought it better not to make any charge against the man who had taught him to serve a lesson, and he was consequently allowed to go on his way rejoicing.

An Arkansas editor, after marrying, thus commented in rhyme on the event: "There is not in this wide world a happier life Than to sit by the fire-place and tickle your wife, To kiss her warm lips in your moments of glee, And twist the cat's tail when it jumps on your knee."

Last winter, it is said, a cow floated down the Mississippi river on a piece of ice, and caught such a cold that she has yielded nothing but ice-cream ever since.

Anecdote of Corwin.

The Frankfort (Ky.) correspondent of the Louisville Journal tells the following:

In the House, the bill appropriating $15,000 to the Blind Asylum was passed, and leave was asked and obtained to bring in a vast number of bills. Indeed enough work was initiated to-day to keep the Legislature at work until the 4th of July. And now, while I am in the humor, I want to endeavor to transfer to paper an excellent story, which a mad wag tells most imitatively. Nearly all the political readers of the Journal know William R. Campbell, for so many years the Whig door-keeper of the House of Representatives here. He is responsible for the following:

In the year 1836 Campbell went to Ohio from Nicholas county in this state on the hunt for some runaway negroes. He intended to go to Snake Creek, Warren county, Ohio, where there was a negro settlement, which he had reason to believe harbored his runaways. He stopped at Lebanon, the county seat of Warren, his horse being sore and jaded, and entering the hotel there entered his name on the register. It was about three weeks after the Kentucky State election, and as soon as the loungers discovered that he was from this side of the river they crowded round to learn the result, and one gentleman inquired of him who had been elected Governor. Campbell told him that Judge Clarke had been elected Governor over Mr. Flournoy. The inquirer did not believe this, and offered to bet $100 that it was not the case.

Campbell told him he was not in the habit of betting, but assured him that his information was correct. Just then a black fellow, who had come into the bar-room, a thin dapper fellow, who looked like a barbarian—stepped forward and told the gentleman he was the man for his bet, but the gentleman said he did not want to bet with him, but to take the Kentuckian down, for they were always a bragging set. The black fellow then asked Campbell if he was from Kentucky, and receiving an affirmative answer, proposed they should take a walk together. Campbell hesitated at first, as he was not in the habit of such associations, but remembering the object of his mission, and thinking the darkey could put him on the track of his runaways, he finally consented; as he was somewhat curious to know the object of the request. When on the street he asked Campbell if he ever drank. Campbell replied, "yes, sometimes," upon which his sable guide led him into a coffee-house, and asked if they had any bacon for sale. The keeper said no, when the black fellow told him that he owed him a small bill already, and if he would sell him some bacon he would pay him all, but if he would not he should pay nothing. The keeper then set out some whisky and they both took a drink. Campbell, however, omitted the touching of glasses, as he says, "because it was not customary in Kentucky to hob or nob with a negro."

After the libation, Campbell, seeing an engine passing to a fire, rushed out into the crowd and made several dexterous dodges and passes among the firemen and citizens in hopes to escape his companion, who was becoming rather a bore, and he did not much care to have his friends see him in such company. He contrived to escape and return to the hotel, where he was very soon rejoined by his sable friend. Campbell thought this was becoming rather familiar, and so, to avoid him, he walked out to the stables to look after his nag, but his dark shadow soon followed him. Thinking he would commence a conversation which might lead to inquiries about Snake Creek, he asked what was good for the sore back of a horse chafed with the saddle. The presumed barber seemed a horse leech also, for he promptly replied, "Calomel, dry calomel, the very best thing in the world, sprinkled dry over the raw spot." Campbell, tho' he regarded the fellow as useful, as well as ornamental, was anxious to get rid of him, and so returned toward the hotel again, but his shadow would be at his side. If he fell behind, it would fall back too, and if he hurried his step, it would accelerate its speed. Finally, they stopped, and the intruder commenced the following colloquy: "From what county in Kentucky do you hail?"

"Ah! that adjoins Bourbon, doesn't it?"

"Yes."

"I thought so. I was born in Bourbon myself. Do you know Gov. Burtelf?"

"Very well."

"Do you know Garrett Davis?"

"I do."

"Do you know Chilton Allen?"

"Intimately well."

"Ah! Kentucky is a great State, and you have a great man living among you, Sir—the greatest man the country has ever known or can ever know."

"Whom do you refer to?"

"Henry Clay, Sir—a man, Sir, a head and shoulders above every other man in the Union."

"Why, my good fellow, where did you get acquainted with all these gentlemen?"

"Oh, I served in Congress with them."

"You! why who are you—what's your name?"

"Corwin, Sir—Tom Corwin!"

There! isn't that the best joke on Corwin's dark complexion extant? I don't think it has ever been put to paper before, and it is too good to be lost.

SCHOOL EXAMINATION.—Class in general information, stand up. The class consisting of four youths in various conditions of frowiness, and in garments of the usual counterfeited patched hue, struggle up and prepare for the ordeal.

"Now, then, Jim Smithers—What is a politician?"

"A feller which serves an apprenticeship to living, selling his friends, drinking bad whisky, and neglecting his family, until he gets out of his time, when he gets to be a journeyman office-hunter or a boss office-holder."

"Good! Now, then, next.—What is a popular preacher?"

"A feller who never has a call from the Lord for less than five thousand a year and expenses, including donation parties; also, a feller which amuses himself a lecturing about the country at fifty dollars a pop.—He gives liberally of nothing to the poor, serves the devil in such a way as he thinks will least offend the Lord; wears first class broadcloth and preaches agin pride; rides to church in a carriage and condemns poor people for riding in the cars, and whenever he gets tired of business he gets into an interesting decline, gets a pension from his grateful congregation and becomes a religious sporter. Or else his feelings get too overpowered, and he gets superstitious officially, when if he gets his deserts he'd be suspended physically with a rope."

"Right, next. What is a fool?"

"Well, he's a feller who thinks every man he meets is honest, a fellow who imagines he can make money by being generous to misers, liberal to colporteurs and missionary societies and honest toward rogues."

"Well, and what becomes of them?"

"Of who?"

"Why, fools."

"Yes—well, them that don't go in to startin' newspapers or managin' opera houses for a livin', generally contrive to pick up a precarious and onsatin livin' as schoolmasters."

"Class dismissed; half holiday."

Sidney Smith was complaining of a young gentleman, who, although many years his junior, was in the habit of addressing him by his christian name, a privilege which, as Sidney Smith remarked, he only allowed his most intimate friends.

Soon after the gentleman in question entered the room, and, familiarly addressing Smith as 'Sidney,' inquired how he thought of passing the day. "For my part," he added, "the Archbishop of Canterbury (the then Dr. Howley) has often invited me to pay him a visit at addington Park, and I think I shall drive down and return in the cool of the evening."

"Ah!" returned Sidney, then let me give you a word of advice; I know something of the Archbishop; he is a very excellent man, but rather proud; don't call him 'William,' he might not like it."

A roar of laughter followed this significant speech, and as the discomfited youth left the room, Sidney Smith turned round and quietly remarked, "I think I have settled the cool of the evening at last."

A MOHAMMEDAN RELIC.—The Turkish government has just purchased a relic of inestimable value to Islamism. It is an autograph letter from the Prophet Mohammed to the Macaneas of Egypt, to call the Coptic nation to the faith of Islam. In his report to the French Institute of May 10, 1852, M. Berlin, since filled the functions of chief interpreter to the army of the East, proved the authenticity of this ancient parchment.

The question is on.—"Where do sea birds slake their thirst?" but we have never seen it satisfactorily answered till a few days ago. An old shipper with whom we were conversing on the subject, says that he had frequently seen these birds at sea far from any land that could furnish water, hovering around, and under a storm cloud, clattering like ducks on a hot day at a pond, and drinking in the drops of rain as they fell. They will smell a rain squall a hundred miles, or even further off, and seek for it with almost inconceivable swiftness. How long sea birds can exist without water is only a matter of conjecture, but probably their powers of enduring thirst are increased by habit, and possibly they can do without it for many days, if not for several weeks.

Sydney Smith says: "A good joke goes a great way in the country. I have known one last pretty well for seven years. I remember a joke after a meeting of the clergy, in Yorkshire, where there was a Rev. Mr. Buckle, who never spoke when I gave his health, saying that he was a buckle without a tongue. Most persons who were within hearing laughed, but my next neighbor sat unmoved in thought. At last, a quarter of an hour after we were all done, he suddenly nudged me, exclaiming, 'I see now what you mean, Mr. Smith, you meant a joke.'—'Yes, sir,' said I, 'I believe I did.' said I, 'I believe I did.' Upon which he began laughing so heartily that I thought he would choke and was obliged to pat him on the back."

A REMINISCENCE.—A writer of court recollections for an Indiana paper mentions a curious incident within his own experience. Happening to stroll in the U. S. Court room at Baltimore in 1828, he found a venerable Judge on the bench, a lawyer addressing the court, and another taking notes of his speech. These three and marshal composed every person in the room but myself. They were all strangers. I asked the marshal who they were. "The Judge," said he, "is Chief Justice Marshall, the gentleman addressing the court is Wm. Wirt, and the one taking notes is Roger B. Toney," three of three of the most distinguished men in the United States; and yet, in a city with fifty thousand souls, they were unable to draw an audience to the court room.

MEAT AND GREENS.—About the time of the rise of Know-nothingism in Kentucky, in 1855, an ardent young 'American' was bedeviling an Irishman, by telling him that 'as soon as the Know-nothings get here they will eat you.'

"No, no, says Pat, 'I guess not.'

"Yes they will—blood meat and bones."

"I am not afraid of them—and they are as likely to eat you as me."

"No; they don't eat American meat—they only eat Irish meat."

"Yes but it's spring, now, and won't they want greens with their meat—an' sure you'll do for greens!"

Young America caved.

They have a "Yankee trick" of throwing hot coppers to the Italian organ-grinders in Boston, who burn their fingers in picking them up and create a laugh for the modern Athenians; yet the same class contributed $38 to the aid of the Lawrence sufferers.

Let friendship creep gently to height—if it rush to it, it may soon run itself out of breath.

DIED.

In Marysville, California, on the 10th of February, after a brief illness of brain fever, Orlando M. Douglas, only daughter of James G. and Mary M. Douglas, in the tenth year of her age.

The news of his daughter's death reached Mr. Douglas at Camp Floyd a few days ago, and must have proved a severe shock to his feelings, as he had received no previous information of her illness. To the sorrow which this bereavement must have caused him as well as Mrs. Douglas, many persons in this city who were acquainted with the family during their sojourn here last year, will bear sincere and hearty sympathy. Mr. Douglas left, the day after receiving information of his daughter's death, for California, to join his afflicted and mourning wife.

—At Camp Floyd, U. T., on Friday, February 17th, after a lingering illness of consumption, D. J. Thompson. Mr. Thompson was born in Shelbyville in Kentucky, and was about 34 years old. Before his constitution became impaired, he was a man noted alike for his activity and energy in business, and his intelligence and ability as a correspondent of the press from this Territory.

Wasted Time.

Alone in the dark and silent night,
With the heavy thoughts of a vanished year,
When evil deeds come back to sight,
And good deeds rise with a welcome cheer;
Alone with the spectres of the past,
That come with the old year's dying chime,
There glooms one shadow dark and vast,
The shadow of Wasted Time.

The chances of happiness cast away,
The opportunities never sought,
The good resolves that every day
Have died in the impotence of thought;
The slow advance and the backward step
In the rugged path we have striven to climb;
How they furrow the brow and pale the lip,
When we talk with Wasted Time.

What are we now? what had we been,
Had we hoarded time as the miser's gold,
Striving our need to win,
Through the summer's heat and the winter's cold;
Shrinking from nought that the world could do,
Fearing nought but the touch of crime,
Laboring, struggling, all seasons thro',
And knowing no Wasted Time?

Who shall recall the vanished years?
Who shall hold back this ebbing tide
That leaves its remorse and sad and Tears,
And washes away all things beside?
Who shall give us the strength e'en now,
To leave forever this holiday rhyme,
To shake off this sloth from heart and brow,
And battle with Wasted Time?

The years that pass come not again,
The things that die no life renew;
But e'en from the rust of his creaking chain
A golden truth is glimmering through;
That to him who learns from errors past,
And turns away with strength sublime,
And makes each year outdo the last,
There is no Wasted Time.

Origin of the Mormon Imposture.

In an old number of Littell's Living Age, we find the following account of the origin of the Mormon Church and its founders. We trust that the views of the writer, expressed in 1851, about having a State as the result of such fanaticism and folly, as far removed in the future now as when uttered:

The Rochester American publishes the following from a forthcoming work by Mr. Turner, entitled a "History of Philip and Gorbam's Purchase." Though not entirely new, it is succinct, and communicates some facts coming within the author's personal knowledge:

As we are now at the home of the Smith family—in sight of "Mormon Hill"—a brief pioneer history will be looked for, of the strange, and singularly successful religious sect—the Mormons; and brief it must be, merely starting it in its career, and leaving it to their especial historian to trace them to Kirtland, Nauvoo, Beaver Island, and Utah, or the Salt Lake.

Joseph Smith, the father of the prophet Joseph Smith, Jr., was from the Merrimack river, N. H. He first settled in or near Palmyra village, but as early as 1819 was the occupant of some new land on "Stafford street," in the town of Manchester, near the line of Palmyra. "Mormon Hill" is near the plank road about half way between the villages of Palmyra and Manchester. The elder Smith had been a Universalist, and subsequently a Methodist;

was a good deal of a smatterer in scriptural knowledge, but the seed of revelation was sown on weak ground; he was a great babler, credulous, not especially industrious, a money-digger, prone to the marvelous; and, withal, a little given to difficulties with neighbors, and petty lawsuits. Not a very propitious account of the father of a prophet—the founder of a state; but there was a "woman in the case."

Mrs. Smith was a woman of strong, uncultivated intellect; artful and cunning; imbued with an ill-regulated religious enthusiasm. The incipient hints, the first givings out that a prophet was to spring from her humble household, came from her; and when matters were maturing for denouement, she gave out that such and such ones—always fixing upon those who had both money and credulity—were to be instruments in some great work of new revelation. The old man was rather her faithful co-worker, or executive exponent. Their son, Alva, was originally intended or designated, by fireside consultations and solemn and mysterious out-door hints, as the forthcoming prophet. The mother and the father said he was the chosen one; but Alva, however spiritual he may have been, had a carnal appetite; ate too many green turnips, sickened and died. Thus the world lost a prophet, and Mormonism a leader, the designs, iniquously and wickedly attributed to Providence, were defeated; and all in consequence of a surfeit of raw turnip. Who will talk of the cackling geese of Rome, or any other small and innocent causes of mighty events after this? The mantle of the prophet which Mrs. and Mr. Joseph Smith, and one Oliver Cowdery had worn themselves—every thread of it—fell upon their next eldest son, Joseph Smith, Jr.

And a most unpromising recipient of such a trust was this same Joseph Smith, Jr., afterwards "Jo Smith." He was lounging, idle, (not to say vicious,) and possessed of less than ordinary intellect. The author's own recollections of him are distinct. He used to come into the village of Palmyra, with little jags of wood, from his back-woods home; sometimes patronizing a village grocery too freely; sometimes finding an odd job to do about the store of Seymour Scovell; and once a week he would stroll in to the office of the old Palmyra Register for his father's paper. How impious in us young "dare devils" to once in a while blacken the face of the then meddling, inquisitive lounging—but afterwards prophet—with the old-fashioned balls, when he used to put himself in the way of the working of the old-fashioned Ramage press! The editor of the Cultivator at Albany—esteemed as he may justly consider himself for his subsequent enterprise and usefulness; may think of it with contrition and repentance, that he once helped thus to disfigure the face of a prophet, and, remotely, the founder of a state.

But Joseph had a little ambition, and some very laudable aspirations; the mother's intellect occasionally shone out in him feebly, especially when he used to help us to solve some portentous questions of moral or political ethics, in our juvenile debating club, which we moved down to the old red school-house on Durfee street, to get rid of the annoyance of critics that used to drop in upon us in the village; and, subsequently, after catching a spark of Methodism in the camp-meeting, away down in the woods, on the Vienna road, he was a very passable exhorter in evening meetings.

Legends of hidden treasure had long designated Mormon Hill as the repository. Old Joseph had dug there, and young Joseph had not only heard his father and mother relate the marvellous tales of buried wealth, but had accompanied his father in the midnight delvings, and incantations of the spirits that guarded it.

If a buried revelation was to be exhumed, how natural was it that the Smith family, with their credulity, and their assumed presentiment that a prophet was to come from their household, should be connected with it; and that Mormon Hill was the place where it would be found!

It is believed by those who were best acquainted with the Smith family, and most conversant with all the Gold Bible movements, that there is no foundation for the statement that their original manuscript was written by a Mr. Spaulding, of Ohio. A supplement to the Gold Bible, "The Book of Commandments," in all probability was written by Rigdon, and he may have been aided by Spaulding's manuscript; but the book itself is without doubt a production of the Smith family, aided by Oliver Cowdery, who was school teacher on Stafford street, an intimate of the Smith family, and identified with the whole matter. The production, as all will conclude who have read it, or even given it a cursory review, is not that of an educated man or woman. The bungling attempt to counterfeit the style of the scriptures; the intermixture of modern phraseology; the ignorance of chronology and geography; its utter crudeness and baldness, as a whole, stamp its character, and clearly exhibit its vulgar origin. It is a strange medley of scripture, romance, and bad composition.

The primitive design of Mrs. Smith, her husband, Jo and Cowdery, was money-making; blended with which perhaps was a desire for notoriety, to be obtained by a cheat and fraud. The idea of being the founders of a new sect was an after-thought, in which they were aided by others.

The first means of carrying out their plans, a victim was selected to obviate that difficulty. Martin Harris was a farmer of Palmyra, the owner of a good farm, and an honest, worthy citizen; but especially given to religious enthusiasm, new creeds, the more extravagant the better; a monomaniac, in fact. Joseph Smith, upon whom the mantle of prophecy had fallen after the sad fate of Alva, began to make demonstrations. He informed Harris of the great discovery, and that it had been revealed to him that he (Harris) was a chosen instrument to aid in the great work of surprising the world with a new revelation. They had hit upon the right man. He mortgaged his fine farm to pay for printing the book, assumed a grave, mysterious, and unearthly deportment; and made here and there among his acquaintances solemn announcements of the great event that was transpiring. His version of the discovery, as communicated to him by the prophet Joseph himself, is well remembered by several respectable citizens of Palmyra, to whom he made early disclosures. "It was in substance as follows:

The prophet Joseph was directed by an angel where to find, by excavation, at the place afterwards called Mormon Hill, the gold plates; and was compelled by the angel, much against his will, to be the interpreter of the sacred record they contained, and publish it to the world. That the plates contained a record of the ancient inhabitants of this country, "engraved by Mormon the son of Nephi." That on the top of the box containing the plates, "a pair of large spectacles were found, the stones or glass set in which were opaque to all but the prophet; that these belonged to Mormon, the engraver of the plates, and without them he plates could not be read." Harris assumed that himself and Cowdery were the chosen amanuenses, and that the prophet Joseph, cutained from the world and them, with his spectacles read from the gold plates what they committed to paper.

Harris exhibited to an informant of the author the manuscript title-page. On it was drawn, nicely and bunglingly, concentric circles, between, above, and below, which were characters with little resemblance to letters, apparently a miserable imitation of hieroglyphics, the writer may somewhere have seen. To guard against profane curiosity, the prophet has given out that no one but himself, not even his chosen co-operators must be permitted to see them, on pain of instant death. Harris had never seen the plates, but the glowing account of their massive richness excited other than spiritual hopes, and he, upon one occasion, got a village silversmith to help him estimate their value, taking as a basis the prophet's account of their dimensions. It was a blending of the spiritual and utilitarian that threw a shadow of doubt upon Martin's sincerity. This, and some anticipations he indulged in as to the profits that would arise from the sale of the Gold Bible, made it then, as it is now, a mooted question whether he was altogether a dupe.

The wife of Harris was a rank infidel and heretic, touching the whole thing, and decidedly opposed to her husband's participation in it. With sacrilegious hands she seized over a hundred of the manuscript pages of the new revelation, and burned or secreted them. It was agreed by Smith and family, Cowdery and Harris, not to transcribe these again, but to let so much of the new revelation drop out, as the "evil spirit" would get up a story that the second translation did not agree with the first. A very ingenious method, surely, of guarding against the possibility that Mrs. Harris had preserved the manuscript with which they might be confronted, should they attempt an imitation of their own miserable patchwork.

The prophet did not get his lesson well upon the start, or the household of the impostors were in fault. After he had told his story, in his absence, the rest of the family made a new version of it to one of their neighbors. They showed him such a pebble as may any day be picked up on the shore of lake Ontario, the common hornblende—carefully wrapped in cotton and kept in a mysterious box. They said it was by looking at this stone, in a hat, the light excluded, that Joseph discovered the plates. This, it will be observed, differs materially from Joseph's story of the angel. It was the same stone the Smiths had used in money-digging, and in some pretended discoveries of stolen property.

Long before the Gold Bible demonstration, the Smith family had, with some sinister object in view, whispered another fraud in the ears of the credulous. They pretended that, in digging for money at Mormon Hill, they came across a chest, three by two feet in size, covered with a dark-colored stone. In the center of the stone was a white spot about the size of sixpence. Enlarging the spot increased to the size of a twenty-four pound shot, and then exploded with a terrible noise. The chest vanished and all was utter darkness.

It may be safely presumed that in no other instance have prophets and the chosen and designated of angels, been quite as calculating and worldly as were those of Stafford street, Mormon Hill, and Palmyra. The only business contract—veritable instrument in writing—that was ever executed by spiritual agents, has been preserved, and should be among the archives of the new State of Utah. It is signed by the prophet Joseph himself, and witnessed by Oliver Cowdery, and secures to Martin Harris one half of the proceeds of the sale of the Gold Bible until he was fully reimbursed in the sum of $2,500, the cost of printing.

The after-thought which has been alluded to—the enlarging of original intentions—was at the suggestion of S. Rigdon, of Ohio, who made his appearance and blended himself with the poorly devised scheme of imposture, about the time the book was issued from the press. He unworthily bore the title of a Baptist elder, but had by some previous freak, if the author is rightly informed, forfeited his standing with that respectable religious denomination. Designing, ambitious and dishonest, under the semblance of sanctity and assumed spirituality, he was just the man for the use of the Smith household and their half-dupe and half-designing abettors; and they were just the fit instruments to be desired. He became at once the Hamlet, or more appropriately perhaps, the Mawworm of the play.

Under the auspices of Rigdon, a new sect, the Mormons, was projected. Prophecies fell thick and fast from the lips of Joseph; old Mrs. Smith assumed all the airs of a mother of a prophet; that particular family of Smiths were singled out and became exalted above all their legion of name-sakes. The bald, clumsy cheat found here and there an enthusiast, a monomaniac or a knave, in and around its primitive locality, to help it upon its start; and soon, like another scheme of imposture, (that had a little of dignity and plausibility in it,) it had its Hejira, or flight, to Kirtland, then to Nauvoo; then to a short resting place in Missouri—and then on and over the Rocky Mountains to Utah or the Salt Lake. Banks, printing-offices, temples, cities, and finally a state, have arisen under its auspices. Converts have multiplied to tens of thousands. In several of the countries of Europe there are preachers and organized sects of Mormons; believers in the divine mission of Joseph Smith & Co!

And here the subject must be dismissed. If it has been treated lightly—with a seeming levity—it is because it will admit of no other treatment. There is no dignity about the whole thing; nothing to entitle it to mild treatment. It deserves none of the charity extended to ordinary religious fanaticism, for knavery and fraud have been with it indolently and progressively. It has not the poor merit of ingenuity. Its success is a slur upon the age. Fanaticism promoted it at first; then ill-advised persecution; then the designs of demagogues who wished to command the suffrage of its followers; until finally an American Congress has abetted the fraud and imposition by its acts, and we are to have a state of our proud Union—in this boasted era of light and knowledge—the very name which will sanction and dignify the fraud and falsehood of Mormon Hill, the gold plates and the spurious revelation. This much, at least, might have been omitted out of decent respect to the moral and religious sense of the people of the old states.

Gerrit Smith has got over his "scare." It is said he now sleeps, has a good appetite and talks freely upon recent events. The poor old man evidently thought his time had come, and that Gov. Wise, to use his friend Fred Douglass' words; was going to "bag him." He should remember that Mr. Mason's committee has not got through yet, and it may be necessary to have a relapse.

A Toast.—At a celebration at Port Jervis, the following sentiment was given by Joseph Gibson:

Intemperance—the great Railroad from respectability to ruin—mankind its only freight—the devil its superintendent—the Board of Excise its Directors—rumsellers its engineers and conductors—tippling shops its cars—distilleries its locomotives—prisons and insane asylums its depots and station-houses—its track built on broken hearts and ruined fortunes. With the help of a just God, and the Main Law, we'll annul the Charter—discharge the engineers and conductors—reverse the steam and save the freight.

"My political opinions, sir, are wholly uncommitted." "Well, sir, 'tis a pity your political deeds were not uncommitted too."

We publish in our paper a lengthy communication from Mr. Wm. H. Rogers, in regard to the Mountain Meadows massacre, and a trip which he took to the vicinity where it occurred in the spring of the year 1859. The subject

The first section of this act provides that no person shall be permitted to manufacture for sale or sell any spirituous liquors without first obtaining license therefor as provided in section 2nd of the same act. There is an exception made however, in the case of the "Hot Springs Brewery" at the point of the mountain Utah cove, and those breweries now established at Fairfield, near Camp Floyd. Why this exception was made in favor of these breweries alluded to above is unable to determine, unless it was a perfect knowledge of the fact that any attempt to enforce a law so obviously unjust and arbitrary in its provision would not only be resisted by an appeal to the proper authorities in that district but if necessary, rendered abortive in force. But it is very probable that resistance to this law would be offered by the proprietors of the breweries referred to. As the law provides that the (the proprietors) shall be entitled to manufacture and sell at their respective establishments, and also upon the payment by them for a license not exceeding three hundred dollars." Thus it would appear that the letter of the law would be clearly complied with by the proprietors of said breweries paying the sum of five or ten dollars to the county court.

The Organic Act, or fundamental law of the Territory, provides for the establishment of no other courts than those mentioned in the 9th section; consequently, having defined what courts should be established here with their respective powers and limits, a just and fair interpretation of the meaning and intent of Congress, at the time of establishing Territorial government for this Territory, and the policy for its successful operation, does not preclude the idea, that the Legislature should offer outside the Organic Act, and arrogate to themselves a creative power not conferred or provided for by Congress. The Men Behind the Scenes at Washington.

WASHINGTON, JAN. 13, 1860.

In one of Mr. Bulwer's last and best novels he lifts the veil from the innermost secrets of English statesmanship, and shows how often the ablest of the political leaders of that country are indebted to the unknown and unheralded skill, labor and learning of others. What is true of that country is singularly true of this. We see the prominent figures playing their parts on the stage, but we never see or hear of those behind the scenes—without whom they would be sorry actors indeed. We see the hands on the face of the clock, but not the machinery that moves them. I have often thought that it may repay the investigation of a list if the hard working and obscure intellects engaged in Washington and elsewhere, in supplying brains and material to our great men could be prepared and printed.

Take the single case of the Committee of Ways and Means in the House of Representatives. This the most important of all the standing committees. In it the whole financial policy of the government is annually and constantly developed and ventilated. All the estimates of all the departments are sent into this financial mill, where they are picked, winnowed and prepared for the action of the representatives of the people. The details are vast and complicated, calling for an immense amount of reflection, arrangement, and toil. The chairman of this committee is to the House of Representatives what the Chancellor of the Exchequer is to the English Parliament, and, next to the Speaker, the most important man in Congress. The House is compelled to take his reports upon faith, and, therefore, the selection of the chairman is one of the most delicate and important duties of the Speaker. Every dollar appropriated must first receive the sanction of the Committee of Ways and Means. The army, the navy, the Indian department, the General Post Office, the Land Office, the judiciary, in all its various ramifications; the officers of the customs, the foreign agents of the government, in every part of the world; indeed, the entire administration of this confederacy comes to this committee, seeking the means for its continuance and its operations. Imagine such a personage as Jehu G. Jones, head of the Committee of Ways and Means. Utterly unskilled in the science of government, unblest in intellect, an inferior lawyer, a very awkward parliamentarian, he could no more master the labor or comprehend the details of that position than a blacksmith could understand the machinery of a watch. Even the most accomplished statesman is compelled, when placed in the chairmanship of this committee, to rely upon the efforts of others. The brains of the Committee of Ways and Means are supplied by Mr. Cochran, a clerk, (a modest, quiet, unassuming man, who has served in that capacity a number of years,) who devotes himself at all times to the preparation of the bills, and to the collection of data and information from the various departments of the government. Those who know him speak of him as an extraordinary intellectual machine. His knowledge of figures is so accurate, his integrity so unquestionable, that his calculations are accepted and adopted at once. He may be said, indeed, to be counselor, advisor and director in reference to the most important appropriations. No scheme, however craftily concealed, can pass unchallenged by this sentinel at the door of the national treasury. I understand that he has already prepared all the bills for the action of Congress, and when the Speaker is elected, and the Committee of Ways and Means appointed, they will be immediately presented to the House. And yet, who ever hears of Mr. Cochran, except those who care to inquire into the secrets of the business in this great political center.

Another of these unknown, yet indispensable public servants, is Mr. John M. Barclay, of Indiana, journal clerk of the House of Representatives. Mr. Barclay is as thoroughly versed in the parliamentary secrets and details as Cochran is in the expenditures and revenues of the government. As you enter the House, when it is fully organized, you will see standing on the right of the Speaker a young gentleman named Thaddeus Maurice, who may be called the prompter of the presiding officer. He began his service as a page, and I think it was Mr. Cobb who first took advantage of his skill and talent, and from that day he has been consulted by all the Speakers. When a new Congress assembles it is curious to observe how rapidly he becomes acquainted with the names and appearance of the members; and those who applaud the Speaker for his readiness and proficiency do not know that the quiet, unpretending young man by his side frequently puts the words in the Speaker's mouth.

The Judiciary.

The ninth section of the Organic Act provides for the Judicial department. It declares that this power shall be vested in a Supreme Court, District Court, Probate Court and Justices of the Peace—the District Judges (who compose the Supreme Court) under this act, are appointed by the President. It leaves the Probate Judge and Justice of the Peace, to the appointment of the Territorial Legislature.

It limits the jurisdiction of the Justices of the Peace to matters in controversy of $100 and under, and prohibits them from taking cognizance of title to lands.

The Supreme Court, the District Court and the Probate Courts are to exercise such jurisdiction as may be prescribed by law of the Legislature. It might be said that this gave to the Legislature plenary power of the jurisdiction of the Courts. The same section of the Organic Act, however, provides that,

Writs of error, bills of exceptions and appeals shall be allowed in all cases from the final decisions of said District Court to the Supreme Court.

But in no place does it provide for any appeal from the Probate Court, thus ignoring the idea that the Probate Court was to "possess any jurisdiction in matters, save and except those which legitimately belong to and are exercised by courts of that denomination, to wit, over estates of deceased persons, lunatics, minors, &c. It is absurd to suppose that Congress designed these inferior Judges of Probate were to be entrusted with unlimited jurisdiction, without guaranteeing an appeal to some superior tribunal. Doubtless it was intended that where the jurisdiction of Justices of the Peace ended, there, that of the District Court should commence. The first Territorial legislature made the Judiciary the subject of its first act. This act declares,

That the District Courts shall exercise jurisdiction, both in civil and criminal cases, when not otherwise provided by law.

In this vague language it defines the power of these Courts.

By section 29 it declares,

The several Probate Courts in their respective counties, have power to exercise original jurisdiction both civil and criminal, as well in Chancery as at Common law, when not prohibited by legislative enactment.

By the first it will be seen it only confers on the District Courts such jurisdiction not otherwise provided by law. On the Probate Courts it confers all jurisdiction not actually prohibited by law. Making the powers of the Probate Judge, who holds his appointment from the Legislature, far more ample than those of the District Judges. The next section 30, makes an insidious showing of subordination to the District Court, but its language is too studiously evasive not to strike even the most superficial. It reads thus:

Appeals are allowed from all decrees and decisions of the Probate to the District Courts, except when otherwise expressed on the merit of any matter affecting the rights or interests of individuals.

The exception as fully abrogating all right of appeal as language construed by a Meadon judge can make it.

It was obviously thus the intention by this species of legislation, to pervert the administration of the laws, from the tribunals constituted by Congress, to the ministers and creatures of Mormon power. In every county of the Territory the Probate Judge ranges over the whole domain of the law, with the scales of justice and the sword of retribution. No crime so vast; no charge involving life or liberty he may not punish; no rights of property so important and intricate he may not weigh; and from his august decrees "appeals are allowed, except on the merit of any matter affecting the rights or interests of individuals." It is just to presume, the term individuals applies to the "Gentiles," whether to the "Saints," we can express no opinion. So much for the Judiciary as moulded by the hands of Brigham Young. In the day when he presided over the Territory and his myrmidons filled the Legislature, it was with due form placed upon the statute book. Gov. Cumming and all the army of the United States cannot repeal it, so long as this people shall maintain control of the Legislature. In another we shall review more generally the Statutes of Utah.—Territorial Enterprise

A WEAK SISTER AND AN INJURED BROTHER.—Caution to Clergymen.

Rev. A. S. Finch publishes in the Brockport Advertiser a card of warning to the public, and his brethren, the clergymen, in particular, against a woman whom he married early last fall, and who has since deserted and ruined him. He explains how his ruin was accomplished. While attending the Brockport Camp Meeting, a woman, small in stature, and wearing specs, and prepossessing in appearance, appeared, pursued him in a carriage, told him of her esteem and how much she was worth, and induced him to marry her. He consented, the knot was tied, and she having accomplished his ruin, forsook him, probably to find another victim. Mr. Finch asserts in his card that this woman had served two men, at least, in the same way before—one residing at Belleville, C. W., the other in Wisconsin. The Wisconsin man she left in a desolate condition, with three children to provide for. Let her may immit similar outrages upon others of our sex, we give this much publicity to the statement. Clergymen who may be single susceptible to the influence of the sex and the blandishments of fortune—should beware of females small in stature, prepossessing in appearance, wearing specs, pretending to the possession of great wealth, and who pursue men in carriages to effect their ruin.

Names of the Months.

The names of the months were given by the Romans.

January, the first month, was so called from Janus, an ancient king of Italy, who was deified after his death, and derived from the latin word Januaries.

February, the second month, is derived from the latin word Februus, to purify, hence Februarius; for this month the ancient Romans offered up expiatory sacrifices for the purifying of the people.

March, the third month, anciently the first month is derived from the word Mars, the god of war.

April is so called from the latin Aprilus, i. e., opening; because in this month the vegetable world opens and buds forth.

May, the fifth month, is derived from the latin word Majores, so called by Romulus, in respect toward the Senators, hence Maies or May.

June, the sixth month, from the latin word Junus, or the youngest of people.

July, the seventh month, is derived from the latin word Julius, and so named in honor of Julius Casaa.

August, the eighth month, was called in honor of Augustus, by a decree of the Roman Senate, A. D. S.

September, the ninth month, from the latin word Septem, or seven, being the seventh from March.

October, the tenth month, from the latin word Octo, the eighth, hence October.

November, the eleventh month, from the latin word Novem, nine, being the ninth from March.

December, the twelfth month, from the latin word Decem, ten; so called because it was the tenth month from March, which was anciently the manner of beginning the year.

Two Views of the Case.—Judge C., U. S. Senator from Vermont, related to us a good anecdote the other day illustrative of abolitionism. The morning he was leaving home to enter upon his duties in this city, a straight-faced deacon, who looked upon the whole South as a great pandemonium, called on him and said: "Now, Judge, I want you to do all in your power to abolish slavery."

"Well," said the Judge, "how shall I proceed?"

"Oh, I don't know; but you must abolish it. It's a damnable curse, and must be abolished. You know more about law than I do. The church is my stronghold, but you understand national matters, Judge, and can devise some plan, and I know it."

"The only way I see to abolish it," said the Judge, "is to buy all the slaves and set them free."

"Well, go in for that; have a law passed that the North shall buy them, and then this trouble will end. Yes, you go in strong for that, Judge."

"Just as you say, deacon. I will agree to it in a moment, and will stand my share of the expense.—Here is Woodstock with three hundred inhabitants, and this town would be called on for about six hundred thousand dollars—and I will urge it before the Senate."

The good deacon opened his mouth, then his eyes, allowed his tongue to escape from one corner of his face, scratched his head, and tapped impatiently on the floor with his foot.—As the Judge was leaving the room the deacon's power of speech came to him, and he called out:

"Oh say, Judge, I guess you'd better let slavery alone: the poor black devils are better off in the South than up here in this cold climate!"

There are several just such deacons in the country.—Washington Paper.

The other night, a landlord discovering one of his customers, who was drunk, "sloshing about" in the mire, went to his assistance, and setting him up, said: "What was the matter?" "No," replied the boozy customer, "I ain't sick nor I ain't drunk—but I'm almighty discouraged!"

At a concert recently, at the conclusion of a song, "There's a Good Time Coming," a farmer rose and said, "Master could't you fix the date."

Troubles are like babies, they grow bigger by nursing.
